ILMS OF QUALITY

A WEEK—Th "Bison"—Wednesday, Ambrosio—Friday, a "Bison"—Saturday, ...id

Mr. Exhibitor: Have you exhibited our last two "Bison" Classics: "THE SEA WOLVES" and "A MEXICAN LOTHARIO"? If not, demand these two reels at once and at the same time have your exchange book you for the coming releases: "HER TERRIBLE PERIL" and "THE RANCHMAN'S SIMPLE SON." Without a doubt this week's releases far surpass anything previously released, the acting, staging and photographic quality being perfect.

Released Tuesday, June 28th: "HER TERRIBLE PERIL." In this "Bison" production we show the daring rescue of a young girl, who loses her balance on the edge of a steep precipice and falls below. Clinging to a rock, and about exhausted, she is aided by cowboys, who tie their lariats together and after difficult manoeuvering manage to land her safely at the bottom of the cliff. This picture is full of thrilling situations.

Released Friday, July 1st: "THE RANCHMAN'S SIMPLE SON." If Simon, the ranchman's simple son, had a weakness, it was to torment the different animals about the ranch; and for this he is severely reprimanded and dismissed from service. Simon later on plays an important part in the rescue of the ranchman's daughter from a cowboy who is seeking revenge, and is greatly rewarded for his brave deed. This is a western picture with plenty of snap and vim, as well as good horsemanship.

Favorable Comment on Moving Pictures By Civic Authorities.

It is our well-known policy to give full publicity to anything and everything concerning the attitude of all classes of people toward moving picture exhibitions. There is always profit in a proper consideration of the opinions of critics, which, when favorable, encourage to better efforts; and, when unfavorable, enable the quicker discovery of weak spots and if wisely used strengthen and improve the conditions assailed. Several times during the last few weeks we have recorded various authoritative strictures, commenting upon them, we trust to the profit of our readers.

It is our pleasure here to record the opinion of the Chief of the Bureau of Licenses, Francis Oliver. At a Board of Trade meeting in this city Mr. Oliver told the members "that the motion picture theaters which were just now being condemned by a great many people, were a potent factor in the education of the foreign element and therefore an advantage to the city."

Mr. Oliver said that he had made a study of them through his department and he was convinced they did a great deal of good. He did not approve of the kind of pictures that suggest bad ideas, neither did he favor the opening of moving picture theaters in residential sections.

He further said "that many foreigners who could neither read nor write were enabled through the proper kind of pictures to get a good working idea of the customs of this their adopted country." While we are glad to publish Mr. Oliver's words we are especially pleased in doing so to call attention to the same as an official endorsement of a prediction made in our issue of June 4, when in a contributed article the use of the moving picture was described as "teaching humanity through the universal language of the eye, no matter how varied the languages of the people or how unlearned"; we did not look for so early a fulfillment in these expressed advantages, and are glad to know from such an authority as Mr. Oliver that moving pictures when used as we suggested "are a potent factor in the education of the foreign element, and therefore an advantage to the city."

Coincident with this we also find Mr. Oliver using sound judgment in granting an opposed license after personally inspecting the place and neighborhood, besides consulting the Police Captain of that precinct. When moving pictures in this way satisfy the authorities and cause them to say they are helpful to the people, we are compelled to add that they are filling the ambitions of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

The Morals of the Picture Maker.

In last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD we defended the moving picture from some recent attacks upon it, which permitted of the inference that the picture, per se, was more or less necessarily immoral. We write "inference" advisedly. Those of us who are in the moving picture field, know that the inference is erroneous; on the other hand, the majority of people who are not in the moving picture field, and who have, therefore, only a remote interest in the picture and its progress, would be quite justified in drawing that inference from the utterances printed in last week's paper.

The time is coming, if it has not actually arrived, when the picture may be allowed to take care of itself, or nearly so. The press, boards of censors, public opinion, may be trusted, if not to prevent the production and dissemination of unsuitable pictures, at least to interpose obstacles to their continued exhibition. In other words, the unclean and unsuitable picture, like everything else that is unclean and unsuitable in this world, will be driven out of sight and kept there. Unfortunately we cannot eradicate evil of any kind from the affairs of life, but at least we can treat it as we do the refuse from our houses. We can put it out of sight and thus minimize its effect.

The picture, as we have said, is in a position to take care of itself. In other words, this matter of the alleged obscenity or unsuitability of moving pictures will right itself. Just like a ship in a storm, when the wind subsides. But what of the morals and morality of those who make the pictures? We write with reference, of course, to commercial morals and morality. One of the commonest complaints made against the moving picture business is that it is largely in the hands of a number of people whose commercial principles, or lack of them, retard the progress of the business. We do not wish to be too specific or too precise in this matter. If we were, we should lay ourselves open to the charge of utilizing these pages for the purpose of making personal attacks. This we have neither the right nor the desire to do. But as the representative trade paper of the moving picture industry of this country, we do claim the right to insist that the business should be in the hands of men who shall carry on the business according to the recognized fixed principles of commercial morality.

The moving picture business, in many of its branches, has not yet reached this desirable stage. There are hundreds, nay there are thousands of exhibitors, large and small, throughout the country who handle their business with disregard to public requirements, without any respect for the picture as such, without the necessary ability to discriminate between the good and the bad, the elimination of the good from the bad,—who conduct their houses, to put it mildly, in far from an ideal manner. It is only fear of the law that keeps them from violating it. It is only ignorance of public requirements that prevents them from doing the public justice. Such people as these have no right in the moving picture business. Then, again, in the renting end of matters we are at the present time confronted by a state of affairs of such a chaotic nature that it is difficult to pass an opinion upon it. The renter man has had a hard time, but in many cases he has only himself to blame, for, speaking generally, he does not seem to have considered it essential to get down to the moral method of conducting his business.

Still, there is so much intelligence in the renting field that ere long we fully expect the undesirable element to be eliminated from it. Then we come to the manufacturing end. We are not going to indulge in any wholesale denunciation of manufacturers. That would be absurd. There are straight-forward, honorable business men on all sides. But on, at least, one side of the several sides into which the American manufacturing end is, at present, divided, there are certain elements of instability and unreliability and lack of commercial integrity which hardly make for the progress of the business. We would like to see those elements eliminated. We are not discussing men; we are discussing principles, and that is why we are drawing attention to the subject in this article. Only this week we were talking over this matter with one of the men most prominent in the civic life of New York City, a man in touch with all branches of industry, and he deplored the fact that the moving picture business had attracted to it, and was apparently retaining the presence of, many, many men who are no credit to it. It pleased him to have the assurance, that, besides ourselves, there were many others who are desirous of purging the moving picture business of all these undesirable elements.

What is there, we wonder, about this little picture, that in recent years it has attracted the commercial patronage of thousands of men whose personal and commercial characters are the reverse of favorable? Why should such a beautiful entertainment factor as the picture be handicapped in public esteem and progress by being made the riffraff plaything of the other professions,—the offscourings of other businesses? We suppose that it is because the picture looks such a simple and ready-to-hand vehicle for money making. It was the same years ago, we recollect, with stationary photography. The collodion process attracted all sorts of wastrels from other businesses. So did gelatine photography. But time has eliminated many of these. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest is going into play, and, generally speaking, to-day in stationary photography, there is a far higher commercial standard than there was years ago. This is what we desire to see with regard to the moving picture. It must advance, it must progress, and it must prosper; but it can only do so in the ratio of the commercial morality and integrity of those who make the exploitation of the picture their business. .

The Writing on the Wall.

Mr. Marc Klaw, of the firm of Klaw & Erlanger, is a clever man. He is one of the heads of the greatest theatrical trust in the world, which is being attacked and attacked on all sides by those who stand for freedom of trade in theatrical matters. Klaw & Erlanger are having a pretty hot time of it; but we suppose that Klaw & Erlanger have made, or will have made, enough money out of their Klaw & Erlanger tactics to last them this life, should their trust be disintegrated by the Independents. The other day a writer in these pages noted the fact that Mr. Erlanger did not think the picture would last. Mr. Erlanger's opinion is, no doubt, the wish that is father to the thought. Mr. Erlanger and his organization are directly responsible for the present rotten condition of the American stage, and no doubt Mr. Erlanger sniffs danger in the progress of the picture,—danger to the continuance of vapid, stupid, idiotic plays.

After Mr. Erlanger, Mr. Klaw. Mr. Klaw it seems, and we devoutly hope that we are quoting him correctly, has been talking to a New York Herald interviewer in London. In one of London's most famous restaurants moving pictures are shown gratuitously to the diners. "Ah," says Mr. Klaw oracularly, "this is the beginning of the end. When you give them the pictures for nothing, the public won't much longer pay to see them."

This is about as ridiculous a specimen of the mental process known as argument from the particular to the general, that we have recently come across. Because rich people at a notable restaurant have a few pictures projected by way of novelty, therefore the poor man in the Bronx, or the lower East Side, or Brooklyn or Jersey City, will no longer pay five or ten cents for an hour's entertainment in a moving picture theater!! Rubbish.

This utterance of Mr. Klaw is only another indication of the ostrich-like attitude of the theatrical manager towards the moving picture. They won't see it. They can see it but they don't. For seeing it, and noting its progress, they must know why it is that day by day, and night by night, millions of people are deflected from the ordinary theater to the picture house. It is simply this: that the picture house gives value for money; the ordinary theater does not. You can get a splendid entertainment in a picture house at the rate of ten cents per hour; in the theater you pay at the rate of fifty cents or one dollar or even more an hour. People are asking themselves, have asked themselves, and will ask themselves, why they should pay fifty cents an hour for an article, when they can get it for ten cents. It is all a matter of supply and demand. Moreover, the stage has been robbed of all its illusions, all its glamor, all its mystery. The rising generation does not go to theaters. There are no illusions about the ordinary theater planted in its mind. Adults have no illusions. So they are not going to the theater. The only people who have illusions are women and girls. If they lost their illusions with regard to the ordinary theater, as they seem to be doing, then the ordinary theater is still further driven away from public favor and financial success.

Under the caption, "Will It Last?" we recently printed an article in these pages which answers every possible objection to, or rather argument against, the continued popularity of the moving picture. We adduced evidence which, without a doubt, places the moving picture theater in a position of almost unassailable popularity. This article should be read by Mr. Klaw, Mr. Erlanger, and other gentlemen of the kind, if they are not too busy wondering why the ordinary play is not so popular as it used to be, and casting about for remedies for a state of things which would never have existed if the ordinary theater had been properly administered, and the public were given their money's worth. If the public had been given their money's worth, there would not be to-day in this country, 10,000 or more moving picture theaters, which, whatever their defects or drawbacks may be, certainly cannot be said to give the public under value. For surely enough in all conscience an hour's or more entertainment for five or ten cents cannot be considered expensive. Will theatrical managers note this!

A Liar and His Lies.

The only vestige of truth in the appended article, which we are reluctantly obliged to quote from a publication styling itself The Moving Picture "News" (sic), is contained in the first four lines. The other parts of the article between the brackets [ ] are Lies; inspired by Liars; edited by a Liar; circulated by Liars, and only believed in by Liars—who lie anywhere and everywhere; whose lives are lies; who live by lying; who lie to live and who will lie till death.

Confirmation of the "News" Attitude (?)

Saturday, June the 11th, in the offices of the Sales Company the editor of the Moving Picture World was closeted with the heads of the Sales Company for a period of three hours or more* [and during this time he fully coincided with the attitude of The News regarding the present status of the Independent section of the film industry. He acknowledged that the editor of the Moving Picture News had handled the matter in a common-sense, logical and truthful manner. He admitted that he was in error in opposing the methods of the Sales Company. He apologized for the wrong done them in editorials that he had written against the movement. He acknowledged that the only sane solution to the troubles of the film renting faction was through them being fully and absolutely allied to the Sales Company.

He further stated that he would write an editorial for the coming issue of his paper eulogizing, explaining and confirming, in its fullest sense, the action taken by the Sales Company.]

Lies; lies; lies. Those who are familiar with the facts will agree that a more glaring specimen of journalistic impudence and imprudence was never penned. Still, to give it the lie direct may not be sufficiently convincing to those who are unfamiliar with the details.

Yes; an editor of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD was invited to attend a full board meeting of the Sales Company—a privilege not even granted to their Ananias. We are sure that the Sales Company would not like to see a published report of that conference. We have violated no confidences and as we did not attend the meeting in an official capacity the fact that the press agent of the Sales Company made capital of our visit in his advertisements was, to say the least, an indiscretion on his part. To assume our wholesale approval of the Sales Company was a presumption and its publication demands a public reply.

We do believe in a sales company, but not the Sales Company, although, as we stated to them, we would not refuse to market our goods through them if we were manufacturers. This on the supposition that all the advantages presented to us at this meeting were to be carried out. Any independent manufacturer would be a fool who did not. Cash on delivery for all films sent to them; an allotment of the stock and a seat on the board of directors, fair competition on quality and access to the books of the corporation—what more could a manufacturer ask? But these concessions, made one by one to stem the tide of disapproval, only lay bare the fact that they could not carry out the proposition as they originally intended.

It is better in this matter to be frank once and for all. The Sales Company is a selfish proposition. It is an attempt to line up a lot of people, Independent manufacturers and Independent importers, who do not want to be lined up. It is imposing terms upon them which are ridiculous. Fancy A going to B and saying: "Look here, old boy, I want to sell your goods for you and I am going to charge you so much a week. You are incapable of managing your own affairs. You are a mere mechanic, not to say automaton. I want you to sell your goods through me, and though I don't tell you so, my scheme is to control the business."

It does not concern us so much who are interested in this movement as what is their motive. Are they afraid of competition on quality? They say that they are intent on securing their investments. They want to establish a sound and constant market for the independent manufacturer. Why this outbreak of philanthropy? Are they really at heart concerned for the success of the independent cause or do they want to corral the whole independent side of things for themselves? These are the questions that are agitating the minds of their opponents, the Associated Independent Manufacturers.

The Associated Independent Manufacturers have another difficulty staring them in the face and that is the luke-warm interest of the exchanges. More than that, they have to contend with contemptible business methods on the part of their customers. Shipments are refused, standing orders cancelled while the goods are in transit and other abuses practised which are distracting to the manufacturers and all of which the Sales Company sought to alleviate. That they have not succeeded is not chargeable to their motives but to their methods.

If we criticise the Sales Company on the grounds that their principles are not broad enough, it is for the general good. If we say they have no right to the position they assume we but re-echo public sentiment. True, they point to their contract—the form of contract which was signed under protest in Chicago and which was printed in a former issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. But the exchanges whom they claim to control are some of them openly, some of them secretly, breaking this contract. Can they enforce this contract? Any form of contract to be binding must be based on equity or legal rights. The Associated Independent Manufacturers have at least seen to it that their organization is based on certain legal rights. We refer to the Bianchi patent and the Columbia rights in the Armat-Jenkins patents. Whether these patents are tenable is not the point at issue; but having these rights makes the position of the Associated Independent Manufacturers logical.

It would have been no less impudent for us to officially endorse the Sales Company than it is for their press agent to try and convey that impression. It is not the function of a trade paper to try to mould public opinion. In the matter of factional disputes our duty ends when we present the facts clearly and impartially and allow our readers to form their own conclusions. This we did in our issue of June 18 and previous issues. Last week we gave the subject a wide berth and told our readers how to make, sell and exhibit good pictures—which is what we are here for. It is with regret that we touch upon the political side of things again this week, but to pass such a challenge with silence might be taken by some to signify consent.

As a business proposition we wish the Sales Company collectively, and its promoters personally, all due success. If they can carry through their project they deserve all credit for their perspicacity. If they hold together as a unit they will not only make money for themselves but they will upset all preconceived notions of independent disloyalty.

But for the MOVING PICTURE WORLD to publicly endorse the Sales Company or any other business scheme in the process of evolution—NEVER.

The Mission of the Picture.

The fact that this week the interest of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD was invited in aid of the campaign for the extinction of that dreaded disease, tuberculosis, has started us in a train of thought of which the reader will get an inkling from the title of this article. What is the mission of the picture? What is the mission of the moving picture theater? Not alone in respect of this tuberculosis campaign, if we may so term it, has this question been raised to us. Many men just now are raising the question and it is asked by inference all over the world. Is it the mission of the moving picture to educate, to instruct, to amuse? Is it its mission to teach religion, morals, ethics? Is it its mission to uplift humanity in any way, direct or indirect? What is its mission?

Students of literature, periodical and otherwise of the regular stage, will know that similar questions have from time to time been raised with regard to the ordinary theater, and are being raised at this moment. The older readers of this article will probably bear us out that such questions were never raised in their childhood. To our recollection they were not heard thirty years ago. But in the early eighties the drama began to assume a new phase. Modern ideas began to enter into the theater. You had such men as Ibsen, Pinero, Maeterlinck, Sudermann, Bernard Shaw and others introducing what is known as The Problem Play. The Problem Play, as the reader knows, wraps up in the form of a comedy or drama some great life lesson, or moral lesson, or ethical lesson. It seeks to teach and aims to preach. You get in the theater practically what you get in church—a discourse or thesis, but you get it in more agreeable surroundings than in a church where eternal punishment and other great truths are propounded.

Then, again, besides problem plays, you have plays with a purpose. You have quasi-religious plays, you have plays showing the evils of intemperance, of other vices, you have to some extent educational influences, as well as the moral influence.

It is curious to reflect that since the modern movement, if we may so term it, took possession of the stage of the world, the theater has ceased to be as popular with the masses as it was in the days when pure comedy, pure farce, pure drama—the purely dramatic form of entertainment without any problems or theses or theories or purposes being interwoven into them—it is curious to reflect that under the later influences the stage has ceased to be as popular as it was. The moving picture play, in the minds of the rank and file of the people, the common people beloved of Lincoln, has taken its place. So much for the ordinary theater.

Is it likely that we may witness some such decadence in the moving picture theater? Frankly, we think it is. Not for identical but possibly for similar reasons. For example: we notice there is a tendency on the part of manufacturers to release great religious subjects. These subjects are of course popular with many. But do the majority of the moving picture theater patrons appreciate them? It is open to doubt. Our idea is this: that if a man, woman or child wants or needs religious teaching, they can get it in the proper places, namely the churches, chapels and Sunday schools. Then, again, we have the demand for educational subjects. Are these properly placed in a moving picture theater? We think that having regard to the inclinations of the majority, this is open to doubt. We have this recent instance of the desire on the part of some people to utilize the moving picture theater as a means of inculcating a knowledge of the dangers of tuberculosis. Frankly speaking, for ourselves as patrons of the moving picture theater, we would not go to a moving picture theater to study tuberculosis. We think that we bespeak a popular sentiment here. There are those who think the moving picture theater should be utilized for the purpose of teaching morals and ethical lessons. Again we arrive at a point of difference—a point as to which opinion may fairly be divided. Other uses of the moving picture theater are to teach geography by scenic films, to teach history by properly prepared subjects, etc. Each of the advocates of these sets of pictures think that the moving picture theater exists for the purpose of carrying out one particular mission, whatever it may be.

This is a subject upon which we should like to have the opinions of our exhibiting readers. What films most attract their patrons? We have asked this question before, but now we want to put it in another form. What sort of programme is generally popular with mixed audiences: that in which the purely dramatic, comedy or humorous elements predominate? or that in which the scientific, the religious, the moral, the geographical, the educational, are present in greater or less proportion?

We saw the other day what a number of children thought of the moving picture theater. These were somewhat exceptional children, we should say; most of them rather beyond their time. We find it difficult to believe that there are many wholesome children of tender years who look upon the moving picture theater as an adjunct to the school room. Unquestionably there are such juvenile phenomena, but they do not exist in any considerable numbers, as every man of the world knows.

We want to put it quite clearly and plainly that in our opinion there is danger of obscuring the real, the chiefest, the most lucrative mission of the moving picture theater, that is, to entertain and amuse its patrons. It will be within the recollection of our more careful readers that some eighteen months ago when the press agents of the newly formed Motion Picture Patents Company were publishing their advertising literature, we deprecated too great an insistence upon the "moral, educational and cleanly interesting" aspects of the associated manufacturers' films. By all means, we said, let us have morality and education, but let us have them in their proper places—that is, the church and the schools. We pointed out that in our opinion the moving picture theater had no religious or educational mission. We pointed out then, as we point out now, that it is the mission of the picture in our opinion to entertain and amuse—of course by clean methods—but not to include the sacred teachings of religion and the like in a purely secular programme.

Why do we, who write this article, go to a moving picture theater? Why do we occasionally believe in going to an uptown theater in New York City? To get a little change and recreation from the day's work. So we believe in all sincerity do the vast majority of people. We go to a theater—an ordinary theater—for a similar reason, or we go to a vaudeville house for the same purpose, namely, to be entertained and amused. So we believe do most other people.

We believe that what applies to the ordinary theater, namely, its decaying popularity amongst the masses, may arise in the case of the moving picture theater if the pendulum of modernity, or whatever you like to call it, is allowed to swing too far. All these problem or religious and other plays have depressed the ordinary theater and made it uncommonly dull. We do not want dulness in a moving picture theater. We want lightness, brightness, movement. We want comedy, humor, and, writing personally, we do not want much drama, we do not want to be sent out of the theater in a worse mood than that in which we entered it, and above all things, we do not want to be preached at, nor do we want to be asked to look too much upon the seamy side of life. We want to laugh and smile with the little ones; we want them to laugh and smile with us. Hence the fewer somber themes of robbery, hatred, envy, jealousy, deceit and the sexual scenes that we see on the screen, the better for our individual peace of mind, and we think the better for the entire audience and therefore for the business of the picture.

It will be seen, therefore, that if we were to attempt to define the mission of the picture, we should place in the very forefront of our reply these words: "Above all things it is the mission of the moving picture to entertain and amuse." It should do this in the ratio of something like ten to one, or, putting it in another way, it should be nine-tenths entertainment and amusement, and one-tenth educational, uplifting and all the rest of it. Deadly dulness should never be allowed to permeate the picture. We all know that the "ologies" and "isms" are deadly dull, the best of times, either at the university, college or the school. Do not, therefore, brethren, make the moving picture dull or you will jeopardize its continued popularity with the masses of people.

GENERAL FILM COMPANY PROGRESS.

During the last two weeks a number of exchanges have been offered to The General Film Company and the company has bought the exchanges named below:

Actograph Company, New York, N. Y.
Actograph Company, Albany, N. Y.
Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Co., Rochester, N. Y.
Motion Picture Supply Company, Rochester, N. Y.
Buffalo Film Exchange, Buffalo, N. Y.
C. A. Calehuff, Philadelphia, Pa.
Electric Theater Supply Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

On Wednesday, July 22, a special Vitagraph release was announced. This was a healthy baby girl born to Mrs. J. Stuart Blackton. We are pleased to learn that both are doing nicely.

We learn that J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, leaves for Reno, Nev., early next week to superintend the making of the pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight on July 4. There will be nine cameras on the job constantly in relays of three at a time to prevent any slip or miss by any one camera. In this way every move and every blow of the fight will be shown, and as these are to be the only pictures of this much heralded contest, it is evident from the above that the licensed manufacturers are thoroughly alive to their responsibility.

Picture Personalities.

DAVID HORSLEY.

David Horsley enjoys the distinction of being the oldest Independent manufacturer of moving pictures in this country and may reasonably be proud of it. It seems, oh, such a long while ago, but, as a matter of fact, it is only sixteen months, since both of us, whose names are on the front page of this paper, penetrated into the wilds of Bayonne, N. J., to witness the first "Centaur" release. As the late Lord Beaconsfield puts it, "many things have happened since then." A great Independent movement has sprung up. Like the tideway it is ebbing and flowing, chopping and changing. But through all these troubled sixteen months, David Horsley has pursued the "noiseless tenor of his way" and has hung on to his work with commendable tenacity. The result is, that besides turning out pictures which show the best possible kind of advancement, in our opinion, that is, slow, steady progression, he has won the respect of his competitors in the business on both sides, and now stands out a picturesque and interesting figure in the Independent field. Interesting and picturesque because, during the recent spli on the Independent side, he came out with unexpected force and decision, and put his foot down, with such quiet determination, that we felt that in Horsley we at least had a man who knew his own mind.

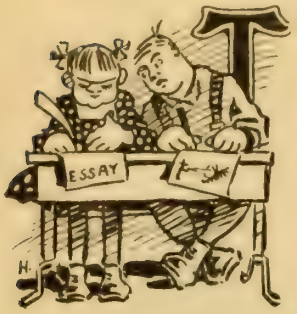
In a recent conversation with Mr. Horsley he especially commended himself to be in virtue of the fact that he is a close student of the technique of moving picture making. He and we were recently standing and watching a new release and Horsley's comments on the technical merits and demerits, defects and excellencies of the picture showed him to be, not merely a moving picture manufacturer, but a moving picture photographer, one well versed in the technique of the subject. Quietly self-restrained, the reverse of blatant, but nevertheless determined to keep up his end of the stick in moving picture making, we are sure that our readers will be glad to see this photograph of the man who is responsible for Nestor and Centaur films.

Last week we complimented Geo. Graff on the photographic quality of his pictures. To this he has now added strength of story and action in the release of this week, "All's Well That Ends Well." In the language of the salesman, all he wants now is orders.

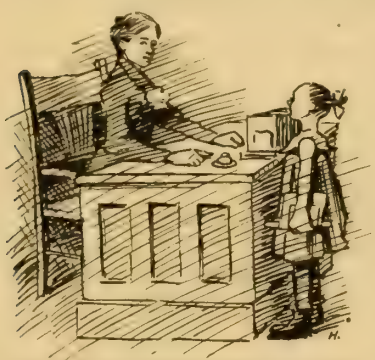
The Essanay Company have published for their Berlin agents catalogues containing descriptions of Essanay films in the Russian and German languages.

Moving Pictures in the Classroom.

By H. F. Hoffman.



THE page of children's essays on moving pictures in the issue of June 4 brought home to me with sudden force a topic on which I was once going to write but didn't. That page of children's talk contains chunks of wisdom, delivered in that frank, simple, blunt and impressionistic brevity of which only a child is capable. Did you ever, as a stranger, stand the inspection of a very young child? If you have, perhaps you've noticed that the younger the child the more deeply those wide open eyes seem to search your very soul. Having gazed at you unflinchingly, sizing you up from head to foot, the child either smiles and extends its hands to you or turns away and hides its head on its mother's breast. It makes up its mind.

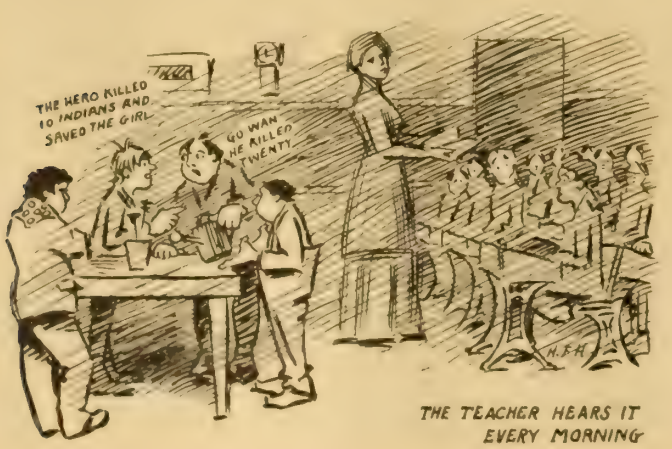


Wasn't George Washington rich, teacher?
Yes, my child, how did you know?
'Cause he died in a brass bed.

All children are impressionistic, and some of their impressions when related are certainly laughable. Sometimes, also, childish impressions have an effect that is harmful because they produce bad digestion and bad dreams, and by interfering with the child's sleep they interfere with its health. I never realized what an enormous part moving pictures played in a child's mind until I had been at a couple of meetings that aimed at the regulation or suppression of moving pictures.

The exhibitor and manufacturer of to-day is inclined to forget the days he spent in the school-room. He does not remember the little talks between teacher and pupils about outside matters; how a child is asked to describe in words or in essay some incident, and how the childish impressions are reflected in these descriptions. At those meetings directed against moving pictures it was noticeable that the majority present were school teachers. I learned quickly in talking to them that a new problem had crept in since the days I spent at school, that problem being moving pictures.

Next to the mother, the school teacher is in closest touch with the children of our land, and it is to her they come with their tales of wonder and surprise. It is the most natural thing in the world that she should feel that here has come a great evil for her to battle against if it is conducted wrong, or that a great help has arrived if used aright. I was amazed to learn from these teachers what a tremendous part the moving picture plays in every classroom every day. The pictures furnish either the topic or the final judgment of many a discussion. The child visits the picture show to-night; in the morning the child wants to tell of it, especially if it pertains to some subject that has been under discussion by the class before. The children swear by the pictures and sometimes the teacher has a hard time correcting wrong impressions gained from them. Time and again the pictures are referred to during the history or geography lesson; they are cited by way of illustration many times a day on all topics.



THE TEACHER HEARS IT EVERY MORNING

The teacher of to-day has a rival that was unknown to the teachers of us of an older generation. A new oracle or authority has come to vie with her, at least that is what she thinks, and that is why she sets herself against it. She in her way is powerful and can harm the moving picture as much as it can harm her children. So far the teacher has been its open and avowed enemy, and has instilled into many a young mind that the moving picture is altogether improper, unreliable and unprofitable. Nor can we blame her altogether when for many mornings past she has heard little Abie Goldstein or Denny Kelly or Giovanni Paoli or Henny Schmitt relate some harrowing tale of murder in the first degree, seen at the picture show the night before, and later on found scenes from the same scrawled in their copy books.

In those little essays of that week's issue, is it not easy to derive that the scenic and educational picture is what the children like, in spite of what exhibitors may say to the contrary? Is it difficult for the manufacturer to read between the lines and see the work of the teacher? We see reflected there her struggle against the morbid, the obscene, the violent, and all that is unwholesome. We believe that the teacsher could be made the champion and enthusiast for moving pictures instead of the one to warn against them. All that is necessary for it is to give the children what they call for in those little letters. They don't like cheap melodrama. I always said it and now I know it.

The Qualitative Picture.

II.

Influence of Orthochromatism.

Our last week's article on the qualitative picture has attracted such widespread attention that we are induced to treat of another phase of the subject, viz., the technical means for assuring correct tone values. We find that early in the present year we printed an article on Orthochromatic Moving Pictures. It is by orthochromatizing the film; giving it a properly timed exposure through a yellow screen and correctly developing it that true tone values are obtained in the positive film. At the request of many interested readers we reprint the article:

Orthochromatic Moving Pictures.

A great number of moving pictures made and projected on the screen to-day are fundamentally false. Public taste, we know, favors black and white pictures. Then the tinted picture has a vogue; so has the hand-colored picture. The photographically accurate picture is, however, rarely produced. Perhaps the Gaumont pictures more nearly approach correctness in the photographic sense, because they strike one as having accuracy of tone rendering. By accuracy of tone rendering we mean orthochromatism; and by orthochromatism, we mean correct translation of the luminosity values of the original subject, whatever they may be.

This may seem a somewhat formidable indictment to make against the moving picture, but anybody who gives the matter a moment's serious thought, will see that it is not an unjust one. In recent years the stationary photograph has very largely become orthochromatic, because people are realizing that, while photography cannot lie in the ordinary meaning of the term, that is to say, the camera shows that which is in front of it the moment of exposure, yet essentially it may easily be made to falsify the tones or the lights and shades, or, as we may prefer it, the luminosity values of the subject. For example: An ordinary photograph of a fair-haired lady in a blue dress with golden ornaments is commonly rendered in the print as showing the hair dark and the dress light. In other words, the relative lights and darks of the original are misrepresented in the print.

Roughly speaking, it is the mission of orthochromatic photography to correct this, and to represent in the printing the relative depths, if we may so call them, of the lights and shades. For example: Yellow would be somewhat light, and blue, of course, would be dark; red, too, of its proper depth or tones, and so on throughout the whole range of tones and half-tones of a picture.

If any reader of this article will examine the majority of moving pictures from the point of view that we are attempting to make clear, he will realize what a tremendous amount of falsification exists. Nature is not merely black and white; it has an infinite range of colors and shading of colors. So in the picture on the screen there should be a monochromatic representation of the values of those colors. In other words, the scale of tones or tints or shades in the picture should correspond with the depths of the scale of tones, tints or shades in the original. We trust we have made this simple explanation perfectly clear.

In order that your moving picture should be orthochromatic, it is necessary that the film should be especially sensitized, so as to render it proportionately sensitive to all the rays of the spectrum, or, in other words, to all the shades and tones in nature. If that be done, then the positive made from the negative will register the scale, and, so in the picture on the screen, we shall see accurate tone renderings. It is, therefore, in behalf of accuracy of tone rendering, or, rather, orthochromatism, that we are making this suggestion in this article. Generally speaking, the makers give little or no attention to this point, but we believe it is worth their while to do so, having regard to the fact that a large number of the public is looking at the moving picture from artistic and technical standpoints. This question of orthochromatism is a question of pure technique, however, and one which intelligent film makers can easily master. In the making of the picture a screen is necessary which lengthens the exposure. This interposes a difficulty, as, of course, all moving pictures are more or less instantaneous, and therefore it is a risky matter to prolong the exposure. Nevertheless, as instantaneous orthochromatic photographs of the stationary kind are made, there seems no insuperable reason why they should not be made with a moving picture camera. We commend this little refinement of practice to those most interested. The universal production of orthochromatic moving pictures is, we feel, only a matter of time. Once they are seen and appreciated by the public they will always be demanded, we have no doubt.

Those of our readers who desire to go deeply into the scientific aspects of orthochromatic moving pictures should consult a book entitled "The Photography of Colored Subjects," by C. E. Kenneth Mees, obtainable at Tennant & Ward, 122 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City. Price, 50 cents; postage, 5 cents.

TEACHING BY PICTURES.

[The following editorial appeared in the Pittsburg "Press." It is a valuable public endorsement of the educational moving picture and was sent to us by Mr. James B. Clark, president of the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company. We are indebted to Mr. Clark for his kindness and glad to note this evidence of his alertness for whatever will advance and elevate the business.]

A proposition recently made to the Central Board of Education to install motion pictures in the public schools to illustrate the teaching of geography, history and other subjects merits careful consideration.

It is offered to furnish both pictures and operators free of charge, in pursuance of the motion picture organization's plan to demonstrate the educational value of such pictures.

It is urged that the use of these pictures will bring about a greater degree of interest in the pupil, and that the lessons will be more clearly impressed than under the present system.

On the face of it this seems to be a meritorious proposition. It impresses itself on us as worthy a trial, because it gives promise of being productive of satisfactory results to our educational institutions.

Should the experiment be made, however, it will be necessary to surround it with the proper safeguards, all of which, we presume, are thoroughly understood by the principals to the offer.

It has been urged heretofore that moving pictures in the schools would involve extra and hazardous risks to the pupils, but great strides have been made within recent months in the perfection of films, methods of operating them and other protections.

So thoroughly developed has the industry become that its dangerous element—fire—has practically been eliminated.

The motion picture as a means of entertainment has become one of the most popular institutions of our time.

Millions of dollars have been spent in bringing the enterprise to its present state, and large sums are annually being expended to further develop it.

Seldom has any form of amusement had so great or rapid extension as the motion picture business.

It is a form of entertainment enjoyed equally by the young and old. It presents a means of recreation through which even the person in most humble circumstances may enjoy himself.

The nickelodeon has become the favorite theater of millions of men, women and children. It will continue to grow in popularity so long as the far-sighted promoters of the enterprise give their best efforts toward maintaining a high standard.

Nothing has done more toward bringing motion pictures to their present exceeding popularity than have the films which show the scenery, people and customs of foreign countries.

Some of these pictures practically obviate the necessity for travel. They take the place of a jaunt through lands and scenes of which we have heard and read, leaving the mind impressed precisely as would the actual visit.

Then there are the pictures which deal with commercial subjects, giving the layman a wide understanding of things which hitherto have been extremely hazy.

He is shown in a few striking illustrations the mysteries of lacemaking, the intricacies of rubber production, the manner in which foreign industries of importance are carried on, the making of food products, the fisheries, the fruit-growers, the operation of large plants and a thousand and one other things equally instructive.

One need only refer to the high-class illustrated lectures that are annually given in this city to establish the educational value of the motion picture.

Men spend the best years of their lives amid the scenes of which we are eager to learn, and they bring to us the animated reproduction of these things in the motion picture.

We gather within an hour, perhaps, what it has taken them years to accomplish, and at the outlay of enormous sums of money.

The cost to ourselves is but an inconsiderable fraction of that amount.

Next to actual travel the motion picture is one of the greatest educational institutions at our service.

This being true, then, it seems that its installation in the public schools cannot be productive of anything but good.

The geography lesson, which sometimes is the dryest of subjects to the pupil, would take on additional interest and force if illustrated with a motion picture, showing scenes characteristic of the country or city under discussion.

The pupil would more readily grasp the details of commerce, manufacture, exports and imports, local industries, etc., if they were placed before his eyes as only the motion pictures can reproduce them.

He would more readily and comprehensively understand the customs and manners of the people who live in these foreign lands if he could see with his own eyes how they dress, meet, converse, work, play and subsist.

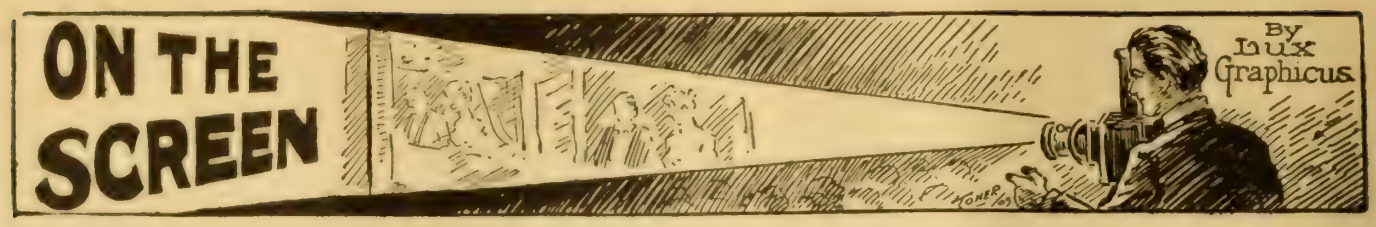
Much of the monotony of routine school work would be eliminated by the motion picture, and the day would be all too short instead of dragging out its weary length until the hour of dismissal comes around.

School would take on added attractions, even for the most studious pupils. They would be afforded advantages that they have never before enjoyed, perhaps.

As a means of easing the strain of too close application to study the motion picture seems to have much in its favor.

The psychological advantages of the motion picture in the school room ought not to be overlooked.

Altogether it is a many-sided proposition, but in the final analysis the sum total of merits seems to be vastly greater than anything which might be raised against it.



Last week I discussed for myself and for the benefit of those readers of the Moving Picture World who are interested in the technique of the picture—I discussed the question of the alleged impermanency of moving picture negatives. Of course, what was then said about the negative applies equally so to the positive. Both are, as the reader knows, deposits of pigmentary silver in gelatine on a support of cellulose, either aceto-cellulose or nitro-cellulose. The nitro-cellulose, it may be roughly said, is the inflammable film; the aceto-cellulose, which is the non-inflammable stock of the Eastman Company and, I believe, the Lumiere Company, is the modern non-inflammable substance.

In the non-inflammability of both negative and positive film stock we have, of course, a distinct contribution towards the permanency of the picture. One element of danger is removed or averted. Tempis fugit. Time flies; and it is astonishing how rapidly it does fly, and how extraordinary are its influences. It is fair to ask what the probable condition in ten years' time will be of the moving picture films on the manufacturers' and renters' shelves to-day. Will they, to repeat my question of last week, be permanent? Will the images of them all be preserved? Will all the films in educational, scientific, bibliographical and national collections be in good condition ten years hence? To come right to the point, there is a fine collection of pictures at Washington in the possession of the Government, dealing with national subjects. I wonder what state these will be in ten years hence?

Since writing the little sermon on moving picture permanency in last week's "On the Screen," my mind has been diverted into the technical end of matters. My friends of the Sales Company have not troubled me. I have not been on Twenty-fifth street, so I have had some opportunity of immersing myself in that chemical laboratory which I always carry under my hat. Gentle reader, I wish you could see that laboratory. It is full of picturesque equations such as $C_{11}H_{12}O_{11} + H_2O$, plus a little bit of lemon peel and a little bit of sugar at a temperature of 212°. This is a very agreeable liquid. Forgive me, reader, I am inclined to be frivolous. To be quite serious, however, I have and always have had a very strong leaning towards the chemical side of moving picture making and the making of stationary photographs.

* * *

The chemistry of the moving picture is but imperfectly understood to-day. Very little attention seems to me to be given to it, and that is why last week, in the course of my screen sermon on permanence, I interjected a little simple chemistry, as to the washing and fixation of the picture. The moving picture makers of the United States to-day are so busy, they are so full of work, that they do not, and perhaps cannot, be expected to handle the purely technical end of matters with as close attention as the subject requires. But they will have to come to it in time. Just as they are getting to the highest possibilities in the producing and dramatic ends, as well as the acting ends. The best producers, the best writers, the best actors and actresses are doing that work; probably not the best photographers, and most certainly not the best chemists, are at the technical end.

I am thinking and speaking generally. Leaving the photographer out of the question, and by the photographer I mean the man who supervises the developing work,—leaving him out of the question, I am probably well within the mark in saying that if there were a good technical, photographic chemist in charge of each plant in the country, the saving in the wastage of material would more than pay his salary. Only this week I heard of some very heart-breaking cases, where thousands and thousands of feet have been wasted by photographic incompetents. A trained photographic chemist, a man familiar with the physics and chemistry of sensitized celluloid, would have prevented all this. In the making of moving pictures at this very moment, in this very country, there is far too much rule-of-thumb and empiricism. Far too much reliance is placed upon conjecture by camera men, photographers and developers. We must get down to scientific exactitude of working if the picture is ever going to be put upon the plane of the highest technique, as well as the highest art.

I started in to write about sensitized celluloid just to show the intelligent reader,—I mean the man who takes a real interest in the technique of moving pictures,—just to show him, what a diversity of material exists for the making of photographs. It might be mentioned that celluloid is not at all essential as a support of the sensitized emulsion. I wonder that some enterprising manufacturer does not use paper. What is that I think I hear somebody say, Paper? Yes, paper!! This reflection came into my mind the other night, when I was watching the presses of the New York "Herald" at work. The first photographic negatives were made on paper. I used paper for making negatives five and twenty years ago; I have used paper in the hand camera; and I have used it in rollable form and got perfect prints from negatives on paper that has been rendered translucent.

Paper is stronger than it seems when properly chosen. If it is pure cellulose, it is not deleterious to the image. It is easily developed; it is easily handled; you can make it translucent, it works readily and it does not contain any chemical bodies which react on the image. You can get moving pictures on it as sharp and as well defined as on celluloid. You can get other good qualities. You do not get halation. It is lighter than celluloid, and we know by direct evidence that in the form of pure cellulose, when made from linen, it is a permanent product. I should not be surprised if the ignoramus, who abounds in the moving picture field, smiled at the idea of paper moving picture negatives, but the intelligent may take it from me that this is a perfectly feasible proposition. My older photographic readers will bear me out in saying that some of the finest photographic work ever produced was made on paper negatives.

Just as I conclude this article, I see a paragraph written by a pathetic charlatan, stating, after a series of falsehoods on another subject, that it has always been his attitude to "uphold the industry." I wonder why, with all the knowledge that this individual boasts of possessing, and in his anxiety to see his friends at 80 Fifth avenue go out of business,—I wonder why he does not tell his supporters at Fourteenth street, how much cheaper they could make their pictures if they would get together, ignore Mr. Eastman, Mr. Lumiere and other people with their celluloid films, and put up a factory for sensitized paper negatives and positives. For you could print positive on paper, make it translucent and get a most beautifully soft image on the moving picture screen. I make the Independent bunch at Fourteenth street a present of this highly valuable suggestion.

William Wright, of the Kalem Company, returned to Chicago Monday morning after completing a trip which included visits to Pittsburg, Pa.; Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, Ohio, and Chicago. He reports business as being good both from the standpoint of the licensed exchanges and licensed exhibitors. The cold Spring we have had has been advantageous to the exhibitors. The sudden change, however, to the extremely warm weather is having more or less effect, causing the sizes of the audiences to grow smaller. After people become accustomed, however, to the change business will no doubt improve.

Ogdensburg, N. Y.—C. W. Marceau, of Ogdensburg, N. Y., has purchased from J. H. Hallberg, New York City, a complete machine and Economizer equipment, including, one Motiograph, 1910 model, double dissolver, with moving picture machine, and one Hallberg double lamp A. C. Economizer. This Economizer gives 30 amperes to each lamp for song slide and lecture dissolving stereopticon and 50 amperes for the lower lamp when used for moving picture machine. Mr. Marceau will open his new theater within two weeks. The order also included a complete Hallberg exhaust and ventilating fan equipment and two flaming arc lamps.

Here is one of many letters I received during the past week:

"I have carefully read all papers devoted to the moving picture business and fail to find anything bearing upon the effects of the purchase of certain film exchanges by the corporation known as the General Film Company. I am very much interested in this matter and ask that you tell us something. Are the people who sold out satisfied with the results? Have any exhibitors suffered through the deal? What is the general sentiment concerning the deal? Has it been for the welfare of the business as a whole, or for only a few men seeking selfish control? If you are in a position to do so I should greatly appreciate a reply."

Unfortunately I am not in a position to reply as fully as the correspondent evidently would have me. There are few men in the business who can size up the situation with a satisfying degree of accuracy; but I am convinced that many of the opinions expressed in connection with the deal are not such as to invite confidence. There is one certainty, if any of the exchange people who sold out to the General Film Company feel they made a mistake in doing so they are keeping remarkably quiet about it. None of them have been talking much since the deal. Those to whom I have heard questions addressed have been brief in their replies: "I am satisfied."

Of this I am certain: There has been a decided change in the sentiments of a number of film exchange owners during the past two weeks. Some of them are openly declaring that, after all, the plan of the General Film Company is the best step thus far taken for the motion picture business as a whole and they are prepared to fall in line with it when opportunity is afforded. I met a couple of these men one night this week and bluntly asked them what had changed their sentiments, well knowing that but a short time ago they viewed the advent of the General Film Company as a horrible nightmare. Both men answered frankly and earnestly. They admitted that for weeks they felt the time was fast drawing near when the monopolistic hand would wrench from them the exchanges they had built up with hard earned money and years of incessant toil; they also admitted that this fear was born of impressions that had no paternity other than the general anti-monopoly sentiment. Their idea was that when the General Film Company had perfected its arrangements the film exchanges would have the alternative of accepting an arbitrary price or fight against extermination. In this, they say, they were mistaken. At least the deals thus far made have shown that the purchasing company has been quite the reverse in its overtures.

One of the two exchange men I refer to stated that he was not at liberty to give the source of his information, but he was convinced the exchange people who have already sold out received entirely satisfactory considerations. The best proof that they were such is the promptness with which the deals were closed.

I suggested that this pecuniary feature had changed the sentiment, but this was refuted with some warmth. It was asserted that while this very naturally would carry some weight, it could not supplant the sound business doctrine that the future must be reckoned, and it is the future with which the policy of the General Film Company deals the most. The sharp competition that exists in the film exchange field to-day is gradually undermining the stability of the business. What has been true in all other great line of manufacture and trade is true with respect to the motion picture business, in which millions upon millions of dollars are invested. The amount of money already spent, and which is being spent daily by manufacturers, film exchanges and exhibitors is enormous, and it would seem that most of the people vitally interested have no idea of the future, but concentrate all energy and thought upon what can be gained to-day. My exchange friend said this had great weight with him and he was sure that the General Film Company was on the right road to a solution of the problem, which must be faced in the very near future.

I remarked that his ideas were no doubt very good, but his expression of them was not sufficiently definite as, for instance, bearing upon the salvation of the business. I asked if the wiping out of the competition would mean the jumping up of rental prices, thus putting the burden on the shoulder of the exhibitor. That is another tale of terror having no foundation in common sense, was the reply. It is ridiculous to assume that the General Film Company intends buying up all the licensed exchanges in the country and then cripple the business of the licensed manufacturers by driving all the rental business to the opposition. The competition spoken of is not the kind now most generally referred to. It is a question of regulating service. Many exchanges are offering what it is impossible to give in order to gain customers and taking advantage of the situation, exhibitors are asking for more than they can reasonably expect. The bane of the picture business has been the constant increase of the number of reels and frequent changes of programs. The manufacturers have in the past been unable to keep up with the first run demand. Day after day they have enlarged their plants, increased their working forces, poured in more capital, and extended their efforts in all directions to meet the issue. And what is the result? The film exchanges are unable to toe the scratch. To purchase the increased output the exchange men must get more money from the exhibitors, and of course the latter object. The point then becomes clear that a system of education must follow. There must be a regulation of service with mutual satisfaction for the manufacturer, the exchange and the exhibitor. This is indeed a hard nut to crack, but it is by no means impossible. Let an example be taken: Here are two exhibitors, each worrying himself to death and the respective exchanges over the selection of subjects. Day in and day out they run identical programs. So far as the public is concerned it is immaterial which is patronized. If the various film exchanges could get together and see the benefit each would derive by agreeing upon programs how nice it would be. But no such arrangement can be carried out. It has been tried, but the almighty dollar is too tempting. Now the General Film Company steps in and secures the exchanges that supply the two exhibitors I have cited as an example. The first step is to stop the exhibitors from eating off each other's head, show them a sane policy. Let each give a different program and let them be kept apart, as it were. I know for a fact that this is what a majority of the exhibitors want. They are even willing to pay an advance in price for it.

Again I prodded the exchange man and said I thought it would be very difficult to successfully carry out such an arrangement because some exhibitors are so tenacious in the preference of certain makes of films. To this I received a reply that from a business standpoint all must concede something when mutual interests are involved. It then becomes a matter of routine to supply each exhibitor with all the makes of film in rotation, giving each an opportunity to secure the patronage of such people as may have preferences as to subjects.

As the exchange man walked away and I thought over what he had said my mind reverted to an afternoon I spent in visiting the picture shows on Fourteenth street, New York. There were two houses located close to each other and the competition between them was exceedingly sharp. The programs were identical. In curiosity I stood near the places to see which was doing the most business. Before I continued my journey I discovered that time and again people came out of one of the places and passed on to the other to read the program. After doing so they walked away and entered a picture show on the next block. I became interested to know why the second place was passed by. Do you know why? I'll tell you. Upon reading the second program the people said: "Why, we just saw those pictures. Let us see if we cannot find something else."

GEORGE K. SPOOR.

MR. SPOOR BACK FROM EUROPE.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, returned last week from a month's sojourn in Europe, looking after his business interests there. Mr. Spoor spent a few days at the Essanay's London office, which is managed by his brother, Mr. Harry Spoor, then continued on to Paris and through to Berlin, where he spent several days in consultation with his Berlin agents. This agency has now arranged to handle the major portion of the Essanay Company's European business. Mr. Spoor expressed himself as pleased with the foreign market outlook. Concerning his trip Mr. Spoor said that although he has been exceedingly busy he had an enjoyable time.

"Our office in London," said Mr. Spoor, "is doing a big business, as are the American manufacturers. The arrangements we have made with our Berlin agents are quite satisfactory and most promising."

THE VITAGRAPH PICTURES OF THE ROOSEVELT RECEPTION.

Two private Vitagraph steam yachts, one special tug, two official tugs, twelve cameras and twenty-four camera men are no small parade in themselves. This was the Vitagraph staff sent out to meet and secure pictures of Mr. Roosevelt on his return, last Saturday, from foreign conquest and fete. They were right in the front and the thick of it from the first toot of the "Kaiserina Auguste Victoria" in salutation to the committee boat "Androscoggin" to the end of the procession, when the Colonel said farewell and started for his home in Oyster Bay.

Five thousand feet of negatives was taken all along the line. From this amount a 450-foot film was selected showing the choicest bits of the reception in the harbor and all along the line. Especially fine are the pictures of Roosevelt secured at close range.

STAFF OF THE BIJOU AMUSEMENT COMPANY.

Springfield, Mass.

A visitor to the office of The Moving Picture World last week was Mr. H. F. Jackson, of the Bijou Amusement Company, operating theaters in Fitchburg and Springfield, Mass. The accompanying picture shows Mr. Jackson, surrounded by his uniformed employees, and he paid The World the compliment of saying that it was our articles on uniformed employees that had been the inspiration. Mr. Jackson is greatly interested in the educational future of the moving picture and is at present endeavoring to interest the Tuberculosis Society in the preparation of a special film which will be freely distributed to the exhibitors.

WHAT IS A GOOD PICTURE?

By F. H. Richardson.

A New York operator writes asking what my definition of a good picture is. He intimates that in his opinion I ask too much—that I expect more than can be done, even with the best equipment.

In this the gentleman is mistaken—altogether mistaken. Given proper equipment and the requisite knowledge any operator can satisfy me fully, but he will have to attend strictly to business to do it.

My idea of a first class picture is: white, brilliant light, distributed evenly all over the screen, with absolutely no shadows except the shadows of the photograph. There must be no jump or vibration save that due to bad perforation and each scene of the film must be run at a speed calculated to bring out its action to best advantage. In starting, the lights must go off and the picture on at one and the same instant, and at the close the film must not be run clear through, showing a white, blank curtain, but the machine must be stopped just before the final ending—on the last foot of the film. The light must be on the instant the picture is off.

This, in brief, is my idea of good projection. I haven't mentioned sharp definition, sharp focus and such things as that, but have merely outlined the main points and I believe every one must admit that, to the operator of knowledge none of them are at all impossible, though very careful, intelligent work would be required to produce such results and produce them all the time.

RANCH LIFE IN THE GREAT SOUTH-WEST
GREATEST ENSEMBLE OF THE FAST PASSING MEMORABLE CHARACTERS OF THE WEST.
PAT LONG
S

The above represents a beautiful poster of a remarkable film shortly to be issued as a special by the Selig Polyscope Company. For hair-raising escapades this film of the real Wild West caps the climax. So does the price that it cost Mr. Selig. The figures are not for publication, but "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest" to produce cost as much as would buy a 1,000-acre ranch, and the picture will be worth to the exhibitor just whatever he can afford to pay.

BROADWAY'S LATEST MISTAKE.

We have noticed for some weeks past that the popular little Bijou Theater on Broadway at Thirtieth street has been converted into a picture house, and we have waited for a convenient opportunity to pay the theater a visit and see for ourselves whether those who are responsible for putting on the pictures have grasped the opportunities which Broadway offers, and which nobody, not a single soul, between Twenty-third and Sixtieth streets, seems to realize; that is, of giving Broadway a real picture house. We mean a house in which the picture is made the predominant feature, plus good music and the like. The Bijou has not risen to its opportunity, although it is a comfy little house, we might say an almost ideal house, for the purpose of studying the picture leisurely and amidst agreeable surroundings.

To begin with, it seems to be felt that at the Bijou there is no necessity for excluding superfluous and extraneous light from the screen. The result was that on the occasion of our visit one afternoon last week some excellent Gaumont, Pathe and Selig pictures were almost, nay, we might say absolutely, spoilt by too much light being thrown on the picture. Then again, a little to the right of the proscenium opening there was visible all through the piece the shadow of the revolving arm of the operator, who was working in the gallery. Also the operator seemed to us to work too fast. We feel that if these little defects are seen to in future and greater care be taken to show the picture at its best, the Bijou Theater still has a chance of becoming a first-class picture house. And in order further to increase that chance, it must cut out the stupid vaudeville which we saw. Also the very indifferent singing. The vaudeville end of matters was only redeemed from absolute failure by some very clever dancing on the part of a boy and a girl.

"The Face at the Window" (Biograph).—A drama with an evident purpose, told in a masterly way and acted with all the dramatic fervor the capable company can command. It is one of those heart stories which have such a direct appeal that one cannot escape from its fascination, nor forget its impression. The downward course, suggested by its results, rather than told direct, the relenting of the grandfather and the final dramatic scene where father, son and grandson meet, the son to face recognition as the grandson is admitted to the University Club. Description conveys no adequate conception of the power and beauty of this unusually satisfactory picture. Not only is it an entertaining story; it is a powerful incentive to right living in that it illustrates too graphically to be mistaken the influence of evil associations. It will rank as the best film of the week, and one of the best for many weeks.

"Red Eagle's Love Affair" (Lubin).—Whether this picture was so intended it conveys a number of interesting suggestions, or possibly one might say, comments, upon the attempt by well meaning individuals and organizations to educate Indians, or others, as well, to a comprehension of what is beyond their semi-savage condition. The weakness in this proposition lies in the fact that the whites can never be induced to accept them upon equal terms, no matter how well educated they are. This love story, worked out with care, conveys this impression very forcibly. The Indian discovered to his discomfiture that the gulf between him and the white girl was not bridged by education, and adopted a sensible course in going back to his Indian sweetheart. While this film does not say the last word on this subject, it suggests it, and will perform a considerable part in convincing students of this complicated problem of the hopeless impossibility of changing the relations between races.

"A Central American Romance" (Edison).—Revolutions are common in Central America, and so are romances. This picture develops a very pretty one which is worked out with a good deal of care in details, and with appreciation of the dramatic requirements of the subject. It is an interesting film, well acted and excellently photographed, using characteristic scenery and staging as a background against which the story is worked out.

"Poor, but Proud" (Pathe).—A love story growing out of the desire of a young man to assist a girl whom he observes in distress. And they lived happily ever after, could be written over this picture. Probably the assumption is not ill placed in this case. At least that is the inference to be drawn from the conclusion of the picture.

"Max Makes a Touch" (Pathe).—Perhaps this film has a reason for existence, but to the writer it seems unworthy of the house from which it comes. It has little point, and almost no interest. It merely adds one more to a program.

"The White Captive of the Sioux" (Kalem).—An Indian story, representing a frontier home, an Indian raid, the capture of Mary and the belief that she is dead for fifteen years. Then she is found, and the film ends with a pretty example of the power of mother love. These pictures are all valuable since they preserve the Indians' manners and customs which will shortly disappear. The stories are all rather dramatic, but they are well sustained, and this one, apart from being a valuable Indian study, has merits of its own as a story. The interest never flags while the film runs.

"Davy Jones' Landladies" (Vitagraph).—Another interesting and funny film, depicting the adventures of Davy Jones and his parrot. He makes love to a number of women this time, and things proceed with a good deal of unction until his wife appears and takes him away with her with considerably more force than elegance. The ending is a hair-pulling match between the two women who were with him when his wife appeared. There is a whole barrel of fun rolled up in this film, and the audience is not slow to discover it.

"The Bandit's Wife" (Essanay).—A dramatic Western picture, containing more tragedy than usually appears in these films. Two really diabolical schemes are hatched, and one succeeds. Because it does succeed a woman dies at the hands of her lover after she has arranged to betray her husband. Even though this picture has qualities which stamp it as unusually good, one rises after seeing it with a feeling that it would have been better if one had not seen it. Undoubtedly such instances are common. Indeed, it may be safely assumed that they are too common, yet after all one does not like to face the unpleasant fact and see such a disagreeable scene worked out before one's eyes. Perhaps this feeling is a tribute, unconsciously paid to the picture. If it were not good, if it were not made real, it would scarcely cause such an impression. Only the best of them succeed in accomplishing that.

"Esther and Mordecai" (Gaumont).—A second picture illustrating the book of Esther in the Bible. The first one closed where Mordecai, uncle of the new queen, Esther, is appointed to sit at the palace gateway. Haman becomes exceedingly jealous of him, and to be rid of him concocts a scheme for a massacre of the entire Jewish race. He prepares a special gallows for Mordecai, but because of Queen Esther's intercession, and her declaration that she is a Jew, the king reverses the decree and Haman is hanged upon the gallows he prepared for Mordecai. This is the dramatic story, and the thread of it is admirably worked out by the actors, while the setting is so sumptuous and the accessories are so nearly historically accurate that one enters into the picture as though one were a spectator of the actual occurrence. It scarcely seems like a picture. The two together form a valuable commentary upon the book of Esther, making the characters described in it actually live before the audience. The house deserves commendation for producing such an excellent work.

"The Spanish Frontier" (Gaumont).—A pictorial excursion to the Basque country, comprising the provinces of Biscay, Alava and Guipuzcoa, which is bounded on the north by France and the Bay of Biscay. The principal distinction between this and other portions of Spain lies in the sharp contrasts between mountain and ocean scenery and in the peculiarities of the inhabitants. The film graphically presents both the wild, picturesque scenery, comprising both ocean and mountain views, and in sharp contrast the beauty of some of the towns. The technical work is admirably done, and the operator chose his view points with intelligence and discretion.

"White Fawn's Devotion" (Pathe).—A dramatic story, with native life and customs as accurately depicted as possible. It is an improvement in this respect over some of Pathe's previous attempts at illustrating Indian life. The dramatic appearance of the supposed dead wife just in time to prevent the man's execution is cleverly managed, and the effect is all that could be wished. Technically the film has no flaw. It is, apparently, as near perfect in this direction as it could be made.

"Ito, the Beggar Boy" (Vitagraph).—A sweet child picture, the scene of which is laid where Buddha reigns. The storm, the child's protection of "Clover Blossom," and the subsequent safety and rejoicing of all concerned combine to make a film of more than ordinary human interest, appealing direct to the emotions through the love of children, which has been implanted in every heart. One's eyes become moist in spite of one's strongest endeavors to prevent it.

"How Championships Are Won—and Lost" (Vitagraph).—Just at this juncture this picture is peculiarly interesting. In it the one-time champion, James J. Corbett, takes the public into the training camp and shows exactly what occurs there. There will be fight pictures aplenty, but none will tell the preliminary story but this one. Here are laid bare all the secrets of the professionals and here are illustrated all the training and the trouble required to put a fighter in condition. The technical work is admirably done and the picture has proved satisfactory.

"Never Again" (Biograph).—Don't butt in could be written down in heavy black letters as the title of this film, and it would be correct. If one does butt in and gets the worst of the argument, as this gallant who got tangled up in another's love affair did, then he has only himself to blame. It is, all things considered, a delightful comedy of love's young dream. While it is not great and will not make a lasting impression it is amusing and will help to while away a few minutes very acceptably.

"May and December" (Biograph).—A love comedy of the months which speedily straightened out the tangles in four lives. Conditions were mixed, due to the mismating, but since affinities will sooner or later discover their soulmates, it is said, regardless of conventions and other restrictions, it was a foregone conclusion that something would upset the calculations and put Cupid in control. And that is exactly what occurred. They got together in the proper sequence at last and everybody was happy ever after.

"The Road to Happiness" (Lubin).—A pretty little story, representing a shop girl on a vacation who discovers that the road to happiness is down the path of love. It is as pretty a picture as one would care to see, and is a constant reminder of the possibilities of love for even a working girl.

"Reconciliation of Foes" (Pathe).—A Roman story, photographed among actual Roman scenes, and developing the old story of the Romans carrying away the Sabine women. Later the same women are shown joining the hands of the Sabines and the Romans and stopping a battle. It is a graphic illustration of the old story, and will make an impression not easily forgotten once it is seen.

"Opening an Oyster" (Selig).—An interesting educational film, representing some of the most graphic features of the oyster business. While the film is short, it is of more than ordinarily good quality and represents careful work in the selection of the scenes which would convey the most information. It is a fitting addition to the growing list of good educational films.

"Bootles' Baby" (Edison).—An entertaining picture admirably adapted from an entertaining story. Bootles is surprised, as he naturally would be to discover a baby in his arm chair at the barracks, but adopts the wise course and determines to care for the foundling which he succeeds in doing satisfactorily. Later he falls in love with the little one's mother without knowing who she is, and to make a somewhat long story short eventually he marries her. Her husband, with whom she does not live, very accommodatingly gets himself killed, which helps the story admirably and adds to its dramatic features. One cannot help but say that this is an extremely entertaining picture. The story contains much of interest, and develops some intensely human features. How anyone can see it without having his interest excited and his attention closely held is a question which seems difficult to understand. Any program will be greatly strengthened by this picture. Artistically no fault can be found with it. Technically it is quite up to the standard. Dramatically it holds the interest of the observers unbroken.

"Hercules and the Big Stick" (Gaumont).—A comedy representing Hercules with a big stick making merry at the expense of a considerable number of old Greek myths. He tans the skin of that Nemean lion, he slays giants and he performs a long list of amusing stunts much too numerous to mention. This picture is recommended to those who accept with more or less seriousness the old Greek legends. After seeing them so ruthlessly disposed of much of the respect which has attached to them in the past will vanish.

"The Little Mother at the Baby Show" (Vitagraph).—A stepmother story that is different in that the stepmother afterward repents of her misdeeds and takes good care of the children. There is much of pathos in it and too much of childish innocence and disappointment. But these defects can be overlooked when the ending develops so pleasantly.

"A Victim of Hate" (Essanay).—A somewhat disturbing story, representing a perfectly innocent girl lured into an evil resort, where her lover, by a cruel stratagem, is made to find her, and an estrangement naturally follows. Then come remorse and a determination to undo the wrong he has committed on the part of the perpetrator, and reconciliation follows. While this picture possesses no great qualities it is true that it is suggestive and indicates what possibilities for evil may reside in a degenerate mind. No fault can be found with the acting, and the various situations appear to be sufficiently dramatic to satisfy all the requirements of the story, but the story will not be remembered as long as some others this firm has told in the past.

"The Wanderers" (Kalem).—A melodramatic picture full of the pathos which brings tears to the eyes, even though one realizes full well that it is only a story. When the girl gives up, and after the closing scene the lonely wanderer starts on his weary way the picture is very pathetic and cannot fail to moisten the eyes. Like all the Kalem plays, the acting is excellent, quite in keeping with the spirit of the story. The actors, too, are sympathetic and impart much of their own personality to their interpretation.

"Perseverance Rewarded" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy, purporting to illustrate the delightful result of a courtship begun under sensational circumstances and continued with all the glamor of romance. Enter the old people, who are speedily outwitted by the young folks. Then they forget their dissension over the younger generation and devote their attention to their own situation. Apparently they decide that dissension shall cease. At any rate, as the film closes the signs all point in that delectable direction.

"Riding School in Belgium" (Pathe).—Its title is sufficiently explanatory. But the excellent photography must be commended. Some of the feats performed by the riders deserve attention, too, since they are little short of marvelous.

"A Child of the Squadron" (Urban).—A dramatic story of how a boy performed a distinguished military service and is adopted as the child of the squadron. It is one of those stories which is pure fiction, but the pleasant ending is an important factor in making it popular. From cruel abuse to the high honors conferred by the squadron almost immediately is surely sufficiently exciting and melodramatic to satisfy the most exacting individual.

"An Excursion into Wales" (Urban).—The outdoor pictures made by Urban all deserve commendation, and this illustration of the Welsh scenery easily takes rank with anything previously offered in this department. Old Chester and its cathedral is particularly pleasing, and other scenes are quite on the same plane. The operator selected his viewpoint with discretion and a thorough appreciation of the artistic possibilities of his subject. The result is a series of pictures hard to equal, and possibly impossible to surpass.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Sea Wolves" (Bison).—A strongly melodramatic picture, yet marred by the fact that a girl is roughly handled by pirates and only barely escapes. A fight in which men are the combatants need not be deprecated, but a fight in which a girl is made to suffer at the hands of some brute is not desirable, and that portion might well be omitted. The escape into the dory and the arrival safe on shore partially compensate for some of the disagreeable features. The objectionable portion had better be taken out.

"The Story of Lulu Told by Her Feet" (Ambrosio).—A novel picture, introducing a method of story telling which is new, but so graphic that it cannot be mistaken. There is no misunderstanding regarding what the story of Lulu is. Her feet are sufficiently eloquent to make it all clear.

"An Interrupted Courtship" (Electrograff).—The story is not particularly strong, but the photography is excellent. Indeed, if the producer succeeded in the future in making the story as good as the pictures the film would be a subject for praise only.

"The Mesh of the Net" (Imp).—A complication arising over the eternal triangle, a pretty girl and two men who want her, a stolen picture and lost money. The young man who has the picture refuses to be searched for the money, but that difficulty is speedily removed and then begins a battle of wits for the young woman's hand well worth seeing. Of course there is a winner in the contest, and one feels very much like offering hearty congratulations when he succeeds in his efforts. It is a pretty story, well told and admirably photographed. There is plenty of action and excellent arrangement of details in working it out.

"The Boss of Circle E Ranch" (Nestor).—This isn't the first time a baby has been a factor in the reconciliation of families. When grandfather hears of his estranged son's hurts and in hurrying to his bedside falls over his grandson's crib, and the aforesaid chubby grandson is ready to make friends the estrangement of years ceases and there is a happy reunion. Perhaps it doesn't matter what caused the difficulty at first. The important matter is the reconciliation. And that is so naturally brought about that it seems quite like the thing to do. The local color in this picture is admirably worked out, and is an important portion of its attractiveness. It is materially strengthened by good acting, which is very sympathetic in some of its phases.

"Fort Du Bitche" (Sales Co.).—A romance of the Franco-Prussian war that ends disagreeably when it might end pleasantly without marring its artistic features. The picture of the blowing up of the fortress is startling in its realism, and the romance that develops is also interesting. But to allow the young officer to throw his life away, or to permit the tragic ending which involves the lack of forgiveness of the girl and her brother for an act of his for which he was in no wise to blame seems unnecessary. All these details can be worked out and the thread of the story carried through to conclusion without accentuating war's horrors by permitting this ending. Technically the film is a success. It is only marred dramatically, as suggested.

"The Devil's Wand" (Lux).—A small boy's experience after an overdose of blackberry jam is graphically told. An application of the paternal slipper both before and after the presentation of the wand may seem a bit too much, yet the stunts performed by those under the influence of the wand are amusing enough to bring about almost any sort of calamity.

"A Cowboy's Race for a Wife" (Bison).—A Western picture, developing a very rapid and exciting race. It is a good addition to the series of Western pictures issued by this house. The setting is good and the acting is snappy and natural.

"Thelma" (Thanhouser).—An adequate reproduction of Marie Corelli's famous novel of the same name. Practically everybody has read the novel, hence no long explanation is required. The picture is admirably staged and acted and maintains the interest from beginning to end. Of course the picture does not contain the detail of the novel, but it is a distinct improvement upon the play. It deserves a long run.

"A Policeman's Son" (Imp).—A love story which includes the complication of a miserly father who objects to the marriage of his daughter with a policeman's son. He frames up a scheme to blame the young man for the alleged robbing of a safe; but the whole scheme is frustrated, because the girl saw her father hide the valuables. The main proposition is that the young folks are married and presumably live happily ever afterward.

"Legend of the Holy Chapel" (Sales Co.).—A picture of great dramatic power, and worked out with some magical appliances and apparatus for making sudden changes. The acting of Jehan is calculated to maintain the interest through the picture. His simulation of frenzy, when he sees the spirit of the man he has murdered appear at almost every turn, is well done. Aside from this one character the action amounts to but little. The scenic qualities are interesting and develop as the picture proceeds. The first prayer, the greatest honor the king could bestow, is tragically transformed into a suicide by which the usurper confesses his guilt.

"Her Lesson" (Centaur).—The results of what appears to be a harmless flirtation are often so serious that they seem out of all proportion to the mere fact of flirting. Perhaps if all girls got a lesson like this one flirting would cease to be popular. Anyhow, girls could take a hint from this dramatic encounter with advantage to themselves and profit to all interested.

"The Old Maids' Picnic" (Centaur).—The story of a picnic made humorous by the complications introduced by the village bad boy. His addition of whisky to the tea created a situation unprecedented in Oldmaiddom, and when the snakes appeared there was an exodus of old maids which never ended until the shelter of the village was reached again. Perhaps some of the humor is a bit broad, but however that may be, everybody laughs when they see it, thus accomplishing its object.

"McNab Visits the Comet" (Lux).—The dream of a man who is comet mad. It permits the introduction of a pretty ballet, and an enchanting fairy vision in a diaphanous gown. Aside from these features it has no particular interest.

"Nevada" (Powers).—A Western drama which contains a suicide that looks like a murder. Fortunately the girl discovers the mistake in time to prevent a lynching. The most attractive feature is the girl's horseback riding. It has the Western snap and go, and even though there is a suicide and almost a lynching these features add to the film's strength.

"The Little Hero of Holland" (Thanhouser).—A graphic illustration of the old love story every schoolboy has heard of the little boy who saved the dyke by thrusting his finger in a hole and staying there until nearly exhausted before he was found. And then he is taken home to fame as the boy hero of Holland. This story has fired the imagination of more than one schoolboy, and adequately produced in motion pictures it will fire the imagination of countless thousands more.

"How Brother Cook Was Taught a Lesson" (Great Northern).—A humorous subject, sufficiently explained in the title and it only remains to say that the actors have performed their parts with discretion, and what Brother Cook got is apparent to everyone.

"Lake of Luzerne" (Great Northern).—A beautiful sheet of water up among the Swiss mountains, combining all the picturesque features imaginable in bewildering confusion. A feature which makes it particularly attractive is the stereoscopic quality of the pictures, making the objects stand out in sharp relief and adding materially to the beauty of the subject.

"The New Sign of the Globe Hotel" (Itala).—A picture containing much action and developing a good deal of interest as it runs. Photography clear and acting convincing combine to make the picture attractive.

"The Distractions of Foolshead" (Itala).—Once again Foolshead appears, and his humorous stunts in developing his distractions are certain to keep the audience roaring. Foolshead is one of the most active knockabout comedians in moving picturedom, and whatever he graces with his lively presence is certain to be above the ordinary, so far as his part is concerned at least. And this one is no exception to the general rule.

"Her Dad's Pistol" (Powers).—A homely drama, representing old Pop Warren assaulted and robbed of his pistol by a bad man, but old Pop's daughter, Nell, recognizes the pistol by the initials carved on it, and by coquetting with the bad man succeeds in having him brought to justice. Not a great story, but well acted and clearly photographed.

"The Phrenologist" (Powers).—The old-time phrenologist was quite content to tell you what your character was at the present. This one introduces a new game by offering something which changes the character. The transformation scenes introduced are funny, and are so admirably acted that they do not seem far fetched.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Focus Trouble.—Bellows Falls, Vt., writes: "I am running a ——— machine and one side of my picture is out of focus about 2 feet. I have tried other lenses but all seem to be the same. If I draw a sharp focus on the side the other part is then out of focus."

Your trouble might be due to the machine setting over to one side of the house instead of facing the curtain squarely. It might be due to the aperture in the gate being too close to the edge of the aperture on one side thus causing a sort of blur on one side of the picture. In this case I think you could not focus that part of the picture at all, however, nor do I think the blur would be 2 feet wide except on a very large picture. It might also be caused by your shutter blade being too short and not reaching clear across the aperture; but, again, you could not focus that portion of the picture at all. It might be caused by one side of your aperture plate being worn more than the other and perhaps not being worn quite level, too. Look up all these items and if none of them proves to be the thing, why come again and I'll try again.

The Editor is "Handed One."—"I have had quite a number of people hand me articles regarding operators and their work. Now I would like to answer same of these wise (?) peopre who are constantly going around with the 'Hammer,' knocking the hardest worked and poorest paid man in the motion picture business. Now, on or about the 30th of April, a paper published an article written by an Expert (?) from the Windy City (whose sole aim seems to be knocking all the men who learned the practical end, and to boost those that have learned what little they know from an operators' school (?). This expert (?) has visited a few places in New York, so he says, and therefore considers himself well enough informed to pass his opinion on New York operators in general but not about Chicago operators (they are friends of his). Well, the sum and substance of his opinion is that all places that run poor pictures is the operator's fault, due to his neglect and carelessness. Not so, my friend, Mr. Expert Wiseguy. Let me tell you something, go into the booth or operating room, introduce yourself (and if the operator, on hearing your name, does not throw you into the street) ask him any of the following questions, or open your own eyes, and you will see the truth of what I say. To start with, we will take the booth or sweat box. The size of the booth is generally about 3½ to 4 feet square and from 5 to 5½ feet in height, in very few instances you will find them 6 feet. The window or peephole, is placed about 2 feet away from the machine, or just about enough to prevent the operator from being able to keep a watchful eye on machine and picture at the same time. There is little or no regard paid to the operator's health. He has to plod through, from one year's end to the other, in a stuffy hole, with little or no ventilation, and if the business gets poor the Boss wants to cut his salary. But no matter how good the business gets, he never gets a cent more. He starts off in the morning about nine o'clock, to change reels, and he must hang around the Exchange three or four hours before the nobility in charge of the place will deign to notice him, then he must gobble a bite to eat, and hustle for all he is worth to get to the theater on time. He must work from nine to fourteen hours a day for the munificent salary of $12 to $15 for seven days. Now the majority of Nickelodeon proprietors imagine that a machine should last a lifetime, and, as far as supplies are concerned, they (the props.) have got the idea that all operators are crooks. When an operator asks for carbons the Prop. is very apt to say, 'Why, I gave you 50 just about a month ago.' They pay 40 or 55 cents for a cheap condenser. Should it crack in the mount on its first subjection to the heat, the operator is at fault, and he is requested to buy another at his own expense. They send their machines to some 'near machinist,' because he repairs it a few cents cheaper than a reliable one would do. Result, ten times more work for the operator. Cheapest oil, poorest carbons, bum second hand machines, bad condensers, rotten burners, rheostats, etc. This is merely breaking the surface, and I have neither the time nor the space to go any deeper at the present time.

"JAMES GARVIN,
"Operator, Academy of Music, Jersey City, N. J."

The above brilliant article, which fairly scintillates with wit—and slang, was printed in the "Statue of Liberty" (enlightening the Independents) recently. It was shown to me and I had one good, hearty laugh. It was so plain on the face of it that someone's toes had been trodden on! It was also so self-evident that Neighbor Garvin is one of those brilliant minds to whom the only argument that appeals is the "throw 'im in the street" one. There is one thing, however, about his letter which I really do admire. That is the fact that he has signed his own name. At any rate he is not a coward. For Friend Garvin's benefit let me say that I have visited many New York operating rooms and have in every instance been cordially received. As to my "Chicago friends," if he will examine the files of The World he will find that I handed out some pretty hot roasts on Chicago operators before I left there, though the performance, viewed as a whole, is far better in Chicago than it is in New York City. The operating rooms are, as a whole, no better, so far as I have seen. And as to Mr. Garvin's plaint, what he says concerning conditions in many operating rooms is quite true. But if any operator puts up with such conditions I don't see that he has any kick coming. If a manager, while I was operating, attempted to introduce me to a 4 x 4 operating room, with a 5-foot ceiling it required just three-fifths of one second for me to tell him to go plumb to the devil. I didn't have to work in such a place, nor do you, Friend Garvin! When I am operating I run the operating room and it is up to the manager to get me the supplies I want, within reason. He will get them, too, or he will get another operator real sudden. More than this, I don't get any film from the exchange. That is not the operator's business. The whole sum and substance of the matter is that operators have gradually let themselves in for conditions that are, as Friend Garvin says, damnable, and now, after it is done, they are howling about it. Every condition Garvin sets forth is present in many houses, but I cannot find it in my soul to pity the man who can be forced to put up with them. The managers have discovered that you are E Z marks and, in the language of the street, they have "handed you a bundle." But since I have heard three men in succession, who have been operating right here in this city for more than three years, tell the examiner they would refuse to hitch up to a No. 1 or No. 0 wire because it "was too strong," and one of them reply to the question, "What is the rheostat for?" by declaring it "was to regulate the heat," I am beginning to wonder how many New York operators are equally well posted. Please understand once and for all that I, for one, accept absolutely no excuse for the operator (except possibly temporarily) putting on a poor show. If he is my kind of an operator he won't work in a house where conditions are such that he cannot produce the best results. If operators took such a stand it would not be long until conditions complained of would vanish. Please understand, also, that my roasts are intended only for those they hit. If the operator is the "hardest worked, poorest paid man around the show" he has but himself to thank for it. But even though that be true I would gladly do anything in my power to improve his condition since he seems to be too much afraid of losing his job he roasts so roundly to do it himself. As to operators' school I certainly am friendly to rightly conducted ones. In fact I lecture at one an hour each day. But I would far rather see the old operators themselves taking the course than to see new men doing it. In my humble opinion it would be the best money the operators of this city ever expended, but that is, of course, up to them. But Garvin makes a mis-statement when he says I "boost for school men." I boost for any man who is able to and does put up a first class performance, regardless of who he is, where he comes from or how he arrived

More from Homer, Ill.—Homer writes as follows: "I took time to-day to try out the water rheostat, illustrated recently in the Column, and find it works fairly well. It might do if it was only to show a night or two, but for use right along it don't seem exactly the right thing. With it I found I could hardly control my light at all when the car passes by. Having no instruments with which to measure current I use various size fuse wires and find with water rheostat about 15 or 20 amperes is the flow, 15 ampere fuse holding for ten to fifteen minutes while 20 carried it all right. (Fuses carry 20 per cent. overload.—Ed.) Now for the rheostat as I have them hooked up. I proceeded in the same way with fuse wire, taking five rheostats of 15 amperes capacity at 110 volts. I hooked them in series as per Fig. 1 and found that a 15 ampere fuse would not carry the combination for any length of time. A 20 was all right, however. It gave poor, yellow light, but steady most of the time. Next I hooked up as per Fig. 2. It took a 25 ampere fuse to carry it, the 20 blowing out in five to eight minutes. Even the 25 fuse became quite warm. Light much better than in any of the other tests. Easier to control and not so much drop when the car passed. Have used the same style rheostats on 110 volts and found them to deliver about 15 amperes. Am now using them as above on 550-volt D. C., or that is what it should be. What it really is I'm blessed if I know."

Now here is something interesting for our readers Frankly, I don't know just what to make of it. I would like some of our friends to explain why Homer gets more current through Fig. 2 than through Fig. 1—if they can! I can't. As to the water rheostat, I hardly think Homer gave it test enough to be quite fair. One would have to, I imagine, learn by experience just how to handle such a contrivance.

Lens Change.—Kansas City, Mo., wrote under date of June 11, but the letter was mislaid. Apologies, K. C. I used to run an engine into your village, on the Wabash, but that was many years ago. The letter runs as follows: "I have been in one house one and a half years. Have 70-foot throw. Recently we remodeled and increased the throw to 80 feet. Had a 5-inch E. F. projection lens, giving a 12 x 14-foot picture at 70 feet. On the longer throw it spread about 10 inches so I got busy and changed my lens, setting the forward lens clear out to the extreme end of the tube and the rear lens likewise. That of course brought the rear lens nearer the aperture and shutter. Does that have any tendency to increase the flicker by reason of the lens being closer to the shutter? The lens now cuts just as sharply as ever and just fits the screen. Have a Motiograph machine and you know the kind of shutter it has. Have had no previous experience in such matters and would like to know what some of our brothers think of the matter."

In the first place, Kansas City, you are lucky; in the second place you are wrong! Making a change such as you did will accomplish the desired result all right, since it has the effect of lengthening the E. F. of the lens. But usually it will injure its sharpness to some extent at least therefore you are lucky. Anything that lengthens the E. F. (equivalent focus) of a lens also lengthens its back focus. Now the rear lens of a projection lens must be away from the film exactly the distance of its back focus. At no other point will your lens focus. As you have lengthened the back focus of your lens it is therefore, perforce, further from the shutter and aperture than it was before. In other words, the whole lens sets slightly further ahead in relation to the aperture. Therefore you are wrong. But the job shows that you have ability and ingenuity and you are therefore to be congratulated. Come again, K. C., the latch string is always out.

Portland Replies.—"Editor Operators' Column: You invited answer from Portland concerning conditions in the moving picture field in this city, as applied to operators. Portland is a first class picture city, strictly union and every operator is obliged to pass a rigid examination as to his ability in order to operate a machine. There are about fifty (50) first class operators in Portland, all of whom are members of the local, all working and receiving good wages. The writer has worked over Washington, Oregon and California and can say that Portland is the best picture city on the entire coast. The operators in the small towns receive from $12 to $15 per week. Possibly our friend, E. J., has tried to get into the union and failed, consequently being forced to work in one of the smaller places, and is seeking revenge. —P. G. R."

Now right here let me caution our readers that in writing it is absolutely necessary that the name be attached to the letter. This one had only the initials of the writer, but as it is the first case of the kind I let it pass with a warning. No man should be ashamed to sign his name to his letters. It is not for publication, however. Now as regards the letter itself: Are we to understand that Portland operators have to "pass a rigid examination" by the union or by the city authorities? Personally the writer don't think much of union examinations. His experience is that they are merely a device, as a rule, to keep out men who are not personally welcome. In other words, when a man who is objectionable to the members applies the examination is such that no man on earth could pass it, but when men who are desired as members apply the examination is largely a bluff. Now mind you, I am not saying that is always the case, but I do say that I have personally known such a state of affairs to exist. The writer is a firm believer in labor unions, but he is of two minds concerning the advisability of obliging applicants to pass anything more than a nominal examination, just sufficient to determine that he really has sufficient knowledge of his business to hold the lowest class job. I am well aware that many will dispute this contention and I have merely set forth my own individual views without asserting that they are right. If the union is in a position to control the field and prevent incompetents from obtaining positions then I would most heartily agree to a most rigid (but perfectly honest) union examination.

In explanation let me say that the foregoing letter is in answer to one by Aberdeen, Wash., in June 4 issue. J. E.'s letter did not impress me as from one seeking revenge, still I was loath to believe it set forth conditions exactly as they were in fair Portland of the Golden West.

Clean 'Em Out.—Denver, Col., asks what causes his carbons, both top and bottom, to get red hot near the carbon arms. The carbon arms often show red also and break frequently. Is using about 35 amperes.

Your carbons do not make good contact with the carbon arms. With a file clean out the inside of the arms, being careful not to remove much metal and to keep the surfaces so that the carbons will set square with each other. Merely clean off the scale and roughness until the inside of the arms and clamps are bright. The carbons and metal will then make good electrical contact and you should have no further trouble. Be sure the inside of the arms are flat clear through so that the carbon will make contact the full width of the metal. The inside carbon arms should be cleaned out quite frequently.

Grease Them.—Tampa, Fla., writes as follows: "The Column is the finest thing that ever happened for theater managers and operators. We have much trouble with the screws which tighten the clamps that hold the carbons in place twisting off. They work all right for a time and then work harder and harder and finally stick altogether. We grease them with vaseline but it don't seem to do much good only for the first time or two after greasing."

This one is easy, Neighbor Tampa. The vaseline you put on burns off almost at once, leaving the screw tight as ever. Grease the screws with vaseline and wipe it off and drop into a box of plumbago (graphite). Shake off the surplus and screw it into place. Do this every day before the machine is used you won't have the least bit of trouble. It takes but a moment and saves lots of aggravation. But you want to look out for one thing. If you've been using dry screws you will have to be very careful or you will break your clamps. Just a little pressure on the screw will now exert three times the pressure on the clamp that a whole lot did formerly. Get the powdered plumbago of good quality, not the flake. A quarter's worth should last you a year.

Lenses.—Portland, Me., asks if there is any way of telling which way the lenses of a projection lens go in after they have become mixed up?

Presumably what Portland means is that he has taken the lenses from their mounts and he doesn't remember which is which. Yes, you may tell as follows: The front lenses, one very thick and one very thin lens, are, or should be, soldered together with balsam. The two rear lenses, on the other hand, are not so soldered but are separate and are separated in their mount by a ring. Place all lenses in their mount so that their heaviest curve will bulge forward (toward the screen). The soldered lens goes in front, with the thin lens toward the screen. The thick lens goes in the back holder first, its curve bulging toward the screen, then the dividing ring, followed by the thin lens and the keeper. If you get the lenses wrong the picture won't be sharp or, in other words, it will have poor definition.

A New Shutter.—Smithport, Pa., writes as follows: "I would like to explain my way of testing a shutter. It is simple and perfect. I set the pin exactly central in the star wheel and look through projecting lens. If it is completely dark it is O. K. If light passes under the travel will be up, if over it will be down. I have just invented a shutter, on which patent is pending, which I believe has unusual merit. It is semi-transparent and gives the smoothest, brightest picture you ever say. You will readily see that with a metal shutter you have the two extremes of brilliant light and total darkness on the curtain. This sudden change, of course, causes a flicker. Now with my shutter I reduce this to a mere shadow, making a more even light on the screen all the time, giving a 75 per cent. exposure which means a much brighter picture. I think you will readily see the merit of this and, when it is on the market, it will be a Kerr shutter and no other. J. W. KERR."

Neighbor Kerr, I hate like thunder to seem to discourage you, but I'm afraid your scheme won't work out. Semi-transparent shutters were tried out years ago and even now one machine has such a blade and another has a perforated flicker blade. You say you propose giving a 75 per cent. exposure! The length of exposure is governed wholly by the rapidity of the intermittent movement and that usually gives from 50 to 58 per cent. only, while a movement of 1 to 6 is all the film will stand. Of course if you can eliminate the flicker blade you might get the 75 per cent. exposure all right, but——. Well, as I said, all that has been pretty thoroughly tried long ago. Maybe, however, you've struck a new scheme that will work out—let us hope so. As to your plan for setting the shutter, I can't see it at all the way you describe it. When the pin is central in the star the aperture would be far more than covered both ways and if any light showed either over or under, the shutter would be "out" very, very bad indeed.

Portland, Ore., June 9, 1910.

Editor Operators' Column:

Dear Sir—I see in your issue of June 4 a letter from Aberdeen, Wash., signed by "E. J. , in which the moving picture shows and operators of Portland are handed an awful "roast."

"E. J.", whoever he may be, declares that there is not one good show in Portland, and that he never saw such miserable work on the screen.

I note, also, that you invite answers to "E. J." in regard to the matter, and on behalf of the moving picture operators of Portland will take the liberty of "butting in" and making a few remarks myself.

You are right in your hope that things in the moving picture world of Portland are not so bad as "E. J." has set forth. In fact you are more than right, for the knocking letter, written by the man who has not nerve enough to sign his real name, is sufficient on it face to show that "E. J." has no real knowledge of what is going on in the moving picture business in this city.

I doubt very much, from the tone of his letter, if he has ever been in a lamp house of this city, and would not be surprised at all if his entire knowledge of the moving picture game in Portland had been gathered from standing around in front of the various picture houses and "rubber-ing" at the posters telling of the pictures which were being exhibited.

No, Mr. "E. J.," whoever you are, you know nothing at all about the Portland moving picture business. You may have been in Portland, but you certainly never passed the examination required before admission to the local union, and undoubtedly you could not pass it.

Had you gathered together at one and the same time sufficient intelligence to pass this examination you would have had better sense than to write such a letter as you have sent to The Moving Picture World.

Also, had you sufficient ability in the operating business to pass the necessary examinations you would not be working in a back woods logging camp like Aberdeen at the present time, but would be right here in Portland, where good—that is, really good—operators are in demand.

Honest, now "E. J.", how much do you really know about this moving picture game?

Have you ever operated a really "good" film? Have you ever worked in a city of more than 10,000 people? Have you ever gotten any closer to a Portland lamp house than the box office down stairs, where you were refused permission to go up and visit the operator?

If you ever have done any of these things you certainly must know that "laziness" is not tolerated in any lamp house in Portland; that, considering the quality of film handed out in this city by the local moving picture trust, the Portland operators class among the best in the country; that perhaps nowhere else in the United States are the rules governing conduct of lamp houses so strictly observed, and also that there are no better paid moving picture men in the West than right here in Portland. Also very few better patronized houses.

Oh, no, dear friend "E. J.", your letter shows much more evidence of a bad case of "sorehead" than it does of the moving picture business in the finest city of the Pacific Northwest.

Thanking you in advance for the space which this will occupy, I am, Mr. Editor,

Yours most sincerely,
F. J. BEIER, Secretary,

Next week I expect to have a complete description of the kinemacolor machine in this column. This is the machine that projects moving pictures in natural colors and is about to be placed in some of the theaters in this country. Mr. Gilbert H. Aymar, general manager of the Kinemacolor Company, has agreed to arrange for a demonstration of the machine for the benefit of the Editor of this column. I will tell you all about it next week, provided nothing unforeseen arises to prevent.

SURGERY TAUGHT BY MOVING PICTURES.

The cinematograph may completely revolutionize many of the teaching methods now in vogue. Already moving pictures are being utilized in some of our schools—for zoological instruction more particularly at the present time—but now that the manufacture, exposure and reproduction of these pictures have been placed on a practical basis there is no reason, says "American Medicine," why this simple, but none the less wonderful, invention should not be used scientifically in many diverse ways.

For instance, a surgeon may be the originator of some special operation. Through special study, application and experience he soon becomes the recognized authority or expert in that particular operation. Heretofore medical men desiring to acquire facility with any particular method have been obliged to make pilgrimages to the clinic or hospital of the recognized expert. Soon this will be unnecessary, for each medical school can have its own collection of films showing classical operations by the world's master surgeons.

In a practical no less than a sentimental sense this will be a splendid thing, for every student will thus be able to study and observe first hand each famous surgeon's methods; not only coming in close relation with each operation itself, but under the most ideal conditions, that is, as actually performed from start to finish by the man best qualified to demonstrate his particular technic.

Other branches of medicine will receive similar benefit as the feasibility and practicability of the moving picture idea becomes an established detail of medical instruction. The consummation of the whole proposition is simply a question of time and the regulation of cost, but it seems improbable that business enterprise will long allow such a promising field to remain dormant.

Albion, N. Y., June 21, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Replying for myself to the query in your editorial in this week's issue, my attitude on the question of the morals of motion pictures is the same as yours, as the following excerpt from my answer to L. H. B.'s communication shows: "Does not the same criticism apply with equal force to the best literature of all ages and nations, and to the stage as well—notably to Shakespeare's plays? . . . It is not showing criminal deeds on the screen, stage or printed page which corrupts the youth; it is glorifying the criminal and caricaturing justice which debases." The picture which Mr. Beach, the critic, denounced so forcibly, deserved it, and even more. tI was one in which a man and a woman go to their room in a hotel, and after preparing to retire, find that the bed is already occupied by the woman's husband. No possible excuse can be offered by any firm for issuing such a picture, nor by any exchange for buying it; still less by any exhibitor for including it in his program. I did not see that picture myself, but describe it as Mr. Beach, one of my regular patrons described it to me. However, I have seen pictures in that same house where this film was shown which were positively indecent.

Censorship, in my humble opinion, is positively essential to the welfare and advancement of the motion picture as a means alike of entertainment and instruction. Whether it be exercised—and judiciously and conscientiously exercised—in the studios of the manufacturers, by the exchanges in making selected purchases, by the exhibitors in refusing to show any improper picture even at the expense of losing the day's receipts, or by a National Board, as is the present method, it must be exercised somewhere, or attacks by broad-minded men and women will again become numerous. I cannot see by that Mr. Collier and his associates have done and are doing much to convince the public that the motion picture is eminently worthy of their respect and patronage. Certainly the standard of productions has risen by leaps and bounds in the past two years, although the manufacturers then claimed that they were doing their level best. While the Board of Censorship cannot by any stretch of the imagination be held chiefly responsible for the improvement, still it is an important contributing factor—a step in the right direction—if looked upon simply as an evidence of good faith on the part of the manufacturers. The public generally looks upon it as a real working force, and I think, with justice. It must be remembered that the manufacturers were not forced to abide by its rulings, and at first, looked upon it as merely an advisory board, until satisfied that full compliance with the suggestions of the Board would make for the advancement of the business as a whole.

Yours truly,
B. G. DRUMMON.

THE H. & H. TRANSFORMER.

Wausau, Wis., June 15, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson:

Dear Sir—Under the heading, "Transformer," in the June 18 issue of The Moving Picture World, we note your inquiry and answer to Rosedale, Miss., and as we are the manufacturers of the H. & H. Current Reducer referred to can give you a little data on same.

The H. & H. Reducer referred to has a maximum output of 1,800 Watts so a 2 K. W. transformer will be needed to supply it without overloading.

Your correspondent states that he uses a few lights and fans, so his present needs could be handled by a 4 K. W. transformer, but this would be taxing it and gives no surplus for addition of more fans or lights which might be desired, so we suggest a 5 K. W. transformer.

We take it that your inquiry is from some power company wanting to know the proper transformer to set up for this theater.

Hoping this data will be of use to you, we are Very truly yours,

AN OPEN LETTER AND A REJOINDER.

160 Lake street, Chicago, Ill., June 20, 1910.

To Manufacturers:

Gentlemen—It appears that the only developments following the Cincinnati meeting yesterday was the further demonstration to the exchanges that their solidifying and standing by each other places in their hands a powerful club, and it is rumored around Chicago to-day that exchanges are not discussing the fact that the other Alliance, or whatever term they may use in connection with themselves, is developing into a boycott organization and further tension between the Associated Manufacturers and the Sales Company is bound to bring advancement to the Patents Company licensees with no ultimate benefits to the Independents.

Personally as an exchange man I have always been appreciative of an organization, the Alliance in particular, and regret that the fact seems to exist that the Sales Company is antagonistic to the Alliance, as this is without foundation.

The present strife has, however, demonstrated to the writer's opinion that there are a great many unreliable and undependable exchange men who are at the present moment extending allegiance to neither party and this letter is written in the hope from a personal standpoint only, that the two manufacturers' factions can at least agree upon a common ground upon the reliable and undependable exchanges and if there is no future harmony they be borne in mind. If there are not such results brought about that the Associated Manufacturers and the Sales Company should be in a position to command absolute loyalty, if this is not feasible nor desirable, the writer's opinion is that there should be no restictions as to whom to sell.

Trusting that these few expressions will be considered in the spirit in which they are written and with the further assurance that they are purely personal on the writer's part without consultation with either party, beg to remain as always for the best interests of the film business,

Yours truly,

W. H. SWANSON.

P. S.—This letter is going to the Sales Company and the Associaed Manufacturers.

27 Lexington avenue, New York, June 22, 1910.

Mr. W. H. Swanson,
160 lake street, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sr—I received a circular letter dated June 21 from you, and although you may believe your information is correct, I supose you will be glad to learn that there were a great many more developments than you mentioned at the Cincinnati meeting. I am writing this letter from my own personal views, and not from any views of my associates, but I wish to say that I have every reason to believe that the Alliance, which you helped to create and of which you were made secretary, and in which you were placed in a position of trust by the other exchanges, felt sure that when crises similar to the Sales Company would arise, they could count on Mr. Swanon to fight any such destructive an organization. But of course there is not an exchange man to-day who would place any confidence in an this letter which you are sending out, inomuch that they have paid attention to your last letters and followed your advice and asked your counsel, and then fund that a directorship in the Sales Company was an inducement sufficient to warrant your deserting your fellow exchanges and leaving them without a head. Luckily we found other men and I feel confident that they will not be deserters. The only exchange men that are members of the Alliance to-day who are undependable, as you state, are the members who had the greatest confidence in you and were the first Alliance members we had at the time you were the leader, and you must personally appreciate their position and I trust that you will not blame them for not being dependable as they are a little more pessimistic than I am, and your treatment of them has helped make them mistrust any leadership. Their mistrust, however, within a few weeks, will be changed, and I look forward to a more loyal bunch of exchange men than the Alliance ever controlled, while you were at their head. You state that you regret that there seems to exist a feeling that the Sales Company is antagonistic to the Alliance. I will state, however, that one of your directors informed me the other day that the Sales Company would never recognize the Alliance. It is not antagonistic to the Alliance as a whole as it is to each and every member, and you may rest assured that each and every member realizes this fact. In your last paragraph you intimate that the Sales Company and the Association should cut off certain exchanges, as they are not dependable for either party. Now, for your own benefit, I will state that you yourself tried to sit on the fence, insomuch that I have seen letters in which you instructed Mr. Thanhouser to ship you direct, and I also had the pleasure of seeing his letter, as a loyal member of the Association, refusing to ship you. Now, if there is to be any cutting to be done, Mr. Swanson, I believe you had better not bring this about as you might be the first man to suffer thereby. As for the two factions in the Independent field agreeing upon a common ground, the Associated Independent Film Manufacturers, of which I am a member, have offered the company, with which you are associated, an agreement, and you, yourself, and only you, are to blame for its not having been signed. This entire fight, which has become disastrous to the exhibitor, could have been settled there and then, but you desired to continue this warfare, which is dangerous to us all. Now, I do not believe that such suggestions as these should come from a man with this blame resting on his shoulders.

I am yours for a better market and not for monopolists extinguishing the life of smaller exchanges by their strength.

Yours very truly,

A. G. WHYTE.

P. S.—This letter and a copy of your letter is being sent to all the interested parties.

SOME FILM MANUFACTURERS SLOW TO RISE TO THE STANDARD OF MODERN EXACTITUDE.

Washington, D. C., April 27, 1910.

Editors, Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—A short time ago I visited several of the somewhat numerous "family" moving picture theaters in the northwest section of Washington with a view to ascertaining what sort of films they presented for their audiences, which were mainly composed of children and their parents. Their programs, taken as a whole, were pretty good, with two or three exceptions.

At one house a film was presented, however, which I think ought never to have got past the National Board of Censors. This film was entitled "In a Difficult Position." The theme of this film portrays the ridiculous efforts of a young man to cover up a wide rip in the seat of his trousers while at a ball, instead of going home as any gentleman with good common sense would have done; and the absurdity of the whole film is climaxed by the host calling the attention of his guests to the young man's plight, whereupon they all have a good laugh at his (the young man's) expense.

That this film was presented in a "family" theater does not necessarily mean that it was the fault of the manager of that theater that such a film was run there. It may have been handed to him by some careless or ignorant exchange clerk, who knew nothing of what he was giving the manager, and probably cared less. Still, in my opinion, the manager of that theater is not eliminated from all criticism for presenting this film to a youthful audience, as he ought to have been on the lookout for films of a more elevating influence and a more educational value.

Such subjects as "In a Difficult Position" are not in the least elevating, and are in no case a credit to the moving picture business. This class of films is the basis for the criticisms of the agitators that the moving pictures have a harmful influence. If a person, who is inclined to be a bit prudish, goes into a theater and sees this class of films (I could name several other films of this same class recently produced by prominent film manufacturers which should never have been released) it is very likely that that person will form an unfavorable opinion of not only the manufacturer of such films but will form an unfavorable opinion of the moving picture business as a whole. He will fail to appreciate the beautiful photography and fine acting and will more than likely overlook everything that can be said in favor of the other films which he happens to see on the screen. It is only too true that most people cannot see the great beauty and value in the moving pictures, but most are sure to see their worst side; and observing that films based on, to say the least, indelicate subjects are released by one of the foremost film manufacturers, they form the erroneous opinion that such subjects are a matter of common release by all manufacturers, and will always be unfavorably impressed with the influence of the whole moving picture business.

At another house I saw the film "Scenes of Convict Life." While this film would probably be all right for presentation in a downtown theater, where the audiences are generally made up of adults, it is not at all the proper thing to present in a "family" theater, of which places, considering that they are patronized to a great extent by children, we have every right to expect more appropriate and more elevating subjects.

"Scenes of Convict Life," as its name implies, gives the observer an idea of the hardships that have to be endured by convicts in what I took to be a Russian prison. One scene shows the fettering and branding of the convicts. The men are firmly held while a red-hot iron is pressed against their breasts, disfiguring them for life. This scene is extremely revolting, and the audience showed its compassion for the convicts by murmuring remarks like: "Oh! those poor fellows!" and "Isn't that awful!"

Next we see the convicts hard at work. The following scene shows a convict being scourged as punishment for some misdemeanor. The man's back is bared and he is held by the guards across a bench, and is beaten by another convict. As the whipping proceeds the man's back becomes covered with blood. And to make the effect worse, the drummer, showing remarkably poor taste, reproduced a sound resembling the falling of the whip across the man's back, which was so realistic that a shiver passed through the audience. I have observed that the musical accompaniment in moving picture theaters has been criticized sharply during the past few months in The Moving Picture World, but I believe that a musician in a theater should have some judgment when to accompany the action of the picture and when not to do so.

The last half of the film shows where a convict makes his escape by sawing the bars in his window and overpowering his guard, but is recaptured after an exciting chase and brought back to be shot, the usual penalty for attempting to escape. Instead of allowing the audience to imagine the execution of the miserable man, we are presented with the full details of the horrible performance right in the screen. First, the soldiers with loaded guns march into the prison courtyard. The convicts are then marched in, and stand where they will witness the execution. Finally the man to be shot is brought in, and takes his place against a post in the center of the screen. An officer wants to bandage his eyes, but he will not permit it. Then the execution takes place, the soldiers shooting the victim, who falls forward in view of the entire audience, across the screen. The convicts are then taken back into prison, and as they pass the dead body, they shake their heads as though determined never to try their chances in escaping. The final scene shows the burial of the dead body wrapped in a canvas bag. It is carried by four convicts under guard to a point on the breakwater and dumped into the sea, the head sinking last. Then the four convicts march back to prison, and the film comes to an end.

There are two things which are never pleasant to witness, either in actual life or on the moving picture screen, namely, insanity and death. To witness the shooting of a man on the screen is, to say the very least, disgusting and revolting, even in the case of an escaped convict. Had the operator been "on the job" he could have darkened the screen at the time of the shooting, but evidently he failed to appreciate the effect of the killing on the audience. The last scene, "the immersion," might, in my opinion, have well been omitted from the film altogether, as it is a proceeding which no person cares to witness.

The film seemed to produce a nervous tension throughout the audience which lasted during the entire show, in fact, the audience seemed to be stupefied for a while. Were it not for a short comedy on the same reel, the effect might hav lasted longer than it did, but after laughing at the comedy everybody seemed to feel better.

In justice to the theater where I saw the above film, I feel it only proper to mention the other picture which they presented, one which contrasted sharply in plot with the convict picture. The film was the Vitagraph's "Wayside Shrine." This beautiful piece of work on the manufacturer's part is a film which might with propriety be shown in any theater in the city, family or otherwise. More films of this sort and less of the two classes mentioned above is, in my humble opinion, the sole means of elevation of the moving picture standard.

At another house they presented a foreign film without a title, which was full of indecency, that could have been omitted from the film without detracting from the interest of its plot. On the same reel was another foreign subject, "No Race Suicide," a comedy and trick picture combined, which, had certain indelicate touches been left out, would have been an enjoyable film for any audience.

I am a "lover" of the moving pictures, and my only interest in pointing out these faults is in the hope that it may bring about the co-operation on the part of the manufacturers in releasing cleaner and more educational subjects, and on the part of the theater manager in using discrimination in the selection of the films which he presents. It may perhaps be interesting to readers to know that the police authorities here have listed twenty-seven films, all of which were released during the past year or two, as questionable and have prohibited their exhibition in the moving picture theaters of Washington. These films were all released by ten of the leading manufacturers, and it surely is no credit to either the moving picture manufacturers or the National Board of Censors to release and pass films which have to be prohibited by the police authorities.

Respectfully,

R. J. W.

Should you find space to print this letter or any part thereof, I wish to request that you do not print my name in full. As a matter of good faith, I attach it below.

The list of prohibited films to which I refer in the last paragraph of the above letter is as follows:

Bank Messenger.	The Black Viper.
Vengeance in a Mine.	The Tramps.
Honor of Thieves.	A Lucky Husband.
The Vaquero's Vow.	Wrongfully Accused.
Concealing a Burglar.	Foiled.
Money Mad.	Romance of a Rocky Coast.
The Fatal Card.	The Villain's Wooing.
Gendarme's Honor.	Caught in His Own Trap.
In Hot Pursuit.	Brother and Sister.
A Victim of His Honesty.	A Pair of Gloves.
The Smuggler's Game.	Shadows of a Great City.
Maggie, the Dock Rat.	The Window Recess.
Bad Companions.	The Last Look.
	Night Duty.

With best wishes for the improvement of the moving pictures themselves, and for the success of The Moving Picture World, I beg to remain, Respectfully yours,

R. J. W.

STEINER BANKRUPTCY CASE DISMISSED

Judge Hough has dismissed, with costs, the petition in bankruptcy filed on April 26 against the Imperial Film Exchange, of 44 West Twenty-eighth street, vacated the appointment of Frank L. Crocker, and the fees and expenses are to be charged upon the petitioning creditors or such of them as moved for the appointment of a receiver.

The Judge said he was convinced that the principal business of the corporation was such as to exclude it from the class of either traders or merchants. Its principal occupation was to rent a patented article which it could not sell, and then hire that which it rented to other persons for limited periods. The articles sold, rented, hired or leased were always to go back to the person or corporation from which they had been obtained; the sole business of the alleged bankrupt was to get profit out of the temporary use of the same. The Judge also decided that the petitioning creditors did not prove the corporation to be insolvent, and also did not prove a fraudulent transfer or concealment of assets.

INDEPENDENT ENTERPRISE

The record scoop of the day was accomplished Saturday, when the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company placed on the market the picture of Theodore Roosevelt's arrival and reception in New York. The event was attended by the most unique methods ever attempted in the history of cinematography in this country. In the first place, five cameras were stationed along the route of the triumphal procession. As fast as an operator took his negative, he raced back to the factory, so that the scene at the Battery was being developed before the fourth man had turned the handle. The grand result was that in spite of very humid atmosphere the complete print was ready in time to be run at the American Music Hall at ten o'clock Saturday night. A great many people of the audience had seen the procession earlier in the day, and it was amusing to hear the remarks of wonderment that the pictures should be on view so quickly. The dispatch did not interfere with the unusually fine quality of the picture, both photographically and otherwise.

CHICAGO NOTES.

We recently received The Folio of Music from the Emerson Music Publishing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and feeling that our knowledge of music was too limited to authentically pass upon the work, we submitted the valuable book to Mr. W. E. King, who is the director of the Orpheum Theater orchestra. Mr. King went over it very carefully and informed us that the Folio was replete with appropriate music for every class of picture. The book is exceptionally adapted for piano accompaniment and is all that its publishers claim for it and even more in Mr. King's opinion.

Mr. Goebel, who is editor of the valuable little pamphlet which is published in the interest of the Kleine Optical Company's high quality films, continues to make this interesting little booklet replete with his witty thoughts. The latest edition, which bears No. 67, is exceptionally good and much credit is due Mr. Goebel for his splendid efforts.

Mr. James, of this city, has taken over Mr. McIntosh's interest in the Three Star Slide Company and is rapidly building up this business by placing on the market an excellent quality of slides for all purposes.

The United States Factories Company will have a new novelty for use as souvenirs in moving picture theaters which they will soon be ready to spring. Their last offering in the way of spoons made such a big hit that we feel assured of the fact that the new one to come will also carry off the honors.

"And a Little Child Shall Lead Them" would be an appropriate title for the new Biograph picture entitled "A Child's Impulse." This picture, which is distributed through the Kleine Optical Company, of this city, is exceptionally rich in photography and carries through it a vein of child tenderness of heart that appeals to all. A child actress always appeals strongly to the theatergoers because every move or action is done naturally and unaffectedly. In this picture a little girl does some very fine work and much comment is due her for the part she takes in this film story.

The pictures of Jack Johnson in training have been getting big money at Riverview Exposition in the theater owned by Mr. Deshon. Mr. Deshon has tried almost every class of show for this building and last year resorted to the pictures of the "Passion Play," of Pathe, and made such a tremendous success with them that he was more than anxious to have the training pictures for this season. Mr. B. K. Hanafourde, who controls these pictures in Chicago, is well pleased with his bookings and claims that the pictures are "going big" everywhere.

White City, Chicago, has adopted a novel scheme; at one corner of the park they are exhibiting free motion pictures, which are used as an added attraction in a little tea garden.

At the Academy of Science in Paris, France, Professor Armand Gautier recently announced that Dr. Botrel had invented a process by which celluloid could be rendered practically non-inflammable.

SCENE FROM "THE KING OF THE BEGGARS" (Eclair).

A daring tale of love and adventure. The elaborate staging and splendid acting in this film story outpoints even some recent Eclair successes. It is something out of the ordinary and can be safely billed as a headliner by the independent exhibitor.

EDISON NOTES—COMING RELEASES

In "The Judgment of the Mighty Deep," to be released on the 24th, the Edison people claim to have one of the most superb sea pictures ever produced. The theme is the world's old story of man's fight for his right and the story is worked out to an intensely dramatic climax beside the breakers that beat upon the shores of a little fishing hamlet. The strongest of human passion, love, hate, revenge and remorse have full sway in its unraveling, with virtue triumphant at the end and retribution swift and sure, meted out to him who violated God's own laws. The principal scenes of the picture are supposed to take place during a storm off shore and fortunately for the general effect they were enacted during a violent storm that swept the Cuban coast. All the grandeur and sublimity of the mighty, restless ocean contribute a terrible realism to this tragic story, which will live long in the minds of an audience as one of the most powerful sea pictures ever thrown upon the canvas.

"The Little Fiddler," the dramatic release of June 28, is a pathetic story in which a man of wealth and fashion, lost to a sense of right and wrong through evil associations, deserts his wife and child and plies the trade of a common thief among the higher set. His restoration to a better life and reconciliation to his family are effected through the arrest of a little street fiddler whom the guest at a fashionable musicale had brought in to play for them and who was later accused of the theft of a purse which in reality the father had purloined. It is a picture that will strike a sympathetic chord in any audience.

The Edison people attempted a pretty big undertaking in the reproduction of the historic fight between the "Bon Homme Richard" and the "Serapis," about which their "Stars and Stripes," to be released on July 1, is built. A wonderful piece of stage setting was constructed for this film, which because of its elaborate effects and the great number of persons employed in its presentation is said to be one of the costliest films ever put out. With Paul Jones as the central figure the "Stars and Stripes" ought to be an ideal 4th of July film.

"Out of the Night," by Rex Beach, and "A Wireless Romance" both dramatic subjects, will be released in the immediate future. In the latter film an exciting and novel feature is a chase between two yachts under full speed. This is another one of the pictures produced in Cuba and for that reason it can be expected to be rich in photographic qualities.

The flip of a coin in the hands of a messenger boy is responsible for the screamingly funny climax in "The Tale of Two Coats," to be released July 5. A tall, thin and very angular public hero discovers a freckled "fresh" messenger "kid" to the railroad station with a suitcase containing his dress suit, which he instructs him to express to a hotel in a nearby city, where he is to be the principal speaker at a banquet in honor of the Governor of the State. On his way to the station the kid is waylaid by a very short and very fat clerk who commissions him to ship his dress suit case, also containing a dress suit, to a suburban home where he is to meet his "best girl" at a house party. The suit cases are identical in appearance, which fact escapes the messenger's attention until he reaches the baggage-room. Here he is nonplussed for a moment only, for a moment, however, for he quickly cuts the Gordian Knot with the loss of a coin.

The outcome of the resulting mix-up is shown in four scenes—two dressing rooms, the party, and the banquet, and it's hard to say which is the funniest.

"Equal to the Emergency" is the charming little comedy which concludes the reel of the 5th. It is a jolly little story which deals with a pair of "newlyweds," the even tenor of whose first few days of housekeeping is interrupted by the enforced absence of the bride. The husband gets lonesome, calls up some of "the boys" and starts a little poker party which so scandalizes the cook that she quits in a dudgeon. Then comes a message from Uncle Whatawad, who is coming on quite hungry to dinner, but "wifie" is away; for Uncle Whatawad objects most emphatically to his nephew's marriage, although he had never seen the girl. The situation is saved by the wife's return and her impersonation of the cook, but an embarrassing contretemps is precipitated by the Uncle's sudden attempt for the pretty cook (?) and his attempt to steal a hug and a kiss. The clever little wife is again to the rescue, however, and finally Eagleton reigns supreme.

LUBIN NOTES.

The Lubin release for July Fourth will not be a patriotic subject. It will offer the best run exhibitors with a valuable heart interest picture that we regard as one of the prettiest child stories we have turned out by such means. "His Child's Captive" is a really unusual story of an exiled father who is brought to a sense of his wrongdoing by his little son. There is no forced sentiment, just the simple, heart-gripping appeal of real life.

"Ferdie's Vacation" gives a new twist to an old story, a twist so new that you'll forget that the foundation situation is not entirely new when you see it July 7. Ferdie wants a vacation and he arranges to receive a telegram that his sister is seriously ill. The other chaps in the office agree to share his work between them and Ferdie is delighted with the success of his scheme until his sweetheart's employer writes that he will stop off to see how the sister is getting along. And Ferdie never even had a sister! The rest is where the most fun comes in.

Most of the heads of departments of the Lubin company are spending their spare time on the roof-top room watching the pocket of the new studio, which brings the interior scenes to a par with its splendid exterior work of the Lubin photographers. For an experiment the other day the studio was set to its full capacity and it was found that twelve big sets could be in position at once, enabling two of the directors to complete their interior scenes in a single day and the other two the next. This will greatly expedite production while improving it.

One of the cowboys attached to the Lubin Stock Company offered a scenario the other day in which the story carried so much funny riding and lock jumping that only a star cowboy could play it. There were numerous intense love scenes and the cat slipped out of the bag when the puncher offered to play the leading role himself and mentioned the leading woman he thought he would like to play opposite to.

That was not the only freak scenario of last week for a man wrote to say that he could play the cornet beautifully, and that he had written a story about his playing that would be very effective if he could go along with the film and play behind the screen. He appeared to be under the impression that but a single print had been sent out.

ESSANAY NOTES.

The Essanay Guide for the first two weeks of July, features another thousand foot comedy, under the title of "An Advertisement Answered." The Guide also contains descriptions of two Western pictures, "The Unknown Claim," and "Trailed to the Hills."

Those who have found the Essanay's full reel comedy subjects of interest will appreciate the Essanay's latest effort in "An Advertisement Answered," which is clever in story, full of wit and effectively produced. The story concerns a young farmer, prosperous and single, who resolves to get married. Having never paid any attentions to the ladies and being acquainted with but few he advertises for a wife. The advertisement brings a host of letters, out of which he selects twelve as possible candidates. Resolving that matrimony is a lottery anyhow, our young friend addresses letters to them all, then selects one from the bunch at random. Satisfied with this he sends one of his hands into the house for the letter and this latter posts all of them. The next day the elected arrive and the young farmer, seeing that something is wrong, starts a jolly Marathon for home with the ladies in pursuit. After a lively chase they overtake him and he is about to suffer violent injury at their hands, it seems, when the farmer's laborers come to his rescue and he is permitted to make a choice at his leisure. The result is most satisfying as is proven later when we have a glimpse of the young farmer's household two years later. There are many good laughs in the film. It is booked for release, Wednesday, July 13th.

The other two comedies described are "A Darling Confusion" and "The Other Johnson," two film stories, cleverly conceived and overflowing with the stuff that laughs are made of. The first tells the story of a wife's jealousy and the results thereof, when she finds a note, written by her husband and addressed to "Dear Darling." The note asks "Darling" to meet her husband at a cafe. The wife resolves to be on hand when the meeting takes place and at the cafe at the appointed time sees a young woman, apparently waiting for some one, whom she concludes is her husband's affinity. Pandemonium reigns for sometime while feminine wearing apparel is scattered about the place. Later the mystery is cleared up when her husband and "Darling," who is a business associate of her husband's appears on the scene. "The Other Johnson" tells of a young lawyer, who is supposed to be the heir of a large fortune from an uncle who died in California. The news is published and Johnson's many friends and relatives, come from all corners of the earth, and he is also harrassed by an army of borrowing friends, peddlers, beggars and charity solicitors. Johnson is almost happy when, after being cleaned out of all his ready cash, he receives word that he is the wrong Johnson. All his friends and relatives, of course, make a hasty departure.

"The Unknown Claim" and "Trailed to the Hills" are the latest from G. M. Anderson and his Western company in Colorado. Both are intensely interesting in their stories, intelligently acted, and superbly photographed. The first tells of a pair of swindlers who endeavor to rob an old ranchman of his rights to a rich and important, but unregistered claim. A young assayer, in love with the ranchman's daughter, saves the claim for them, when he learns of the trick and wins the girl as a result. "Trailed to the Hills" is a strong story, overflowing with heart interest, deep and rich in coloring, and highly dramatic. The wife of a young Easterner elopes with another admirer, who later leaves her. The Easterner finds his wife dying and makes a solemn vow to punish the man. He finds the trail and tracks him to the West

The Essanay Company's Saturday Western release of July 2, "The Bad Man's Last Deed," is an exceptionally strong human interest drama, picturesque in its scenic surroundings and splendidly photographed. It tells of a Western bad man who has won the title of "undesirable citizen" and is requested, after a shooting up affair, to get out of the community, with a warning that he will be instantly dispatched should he cross a certain boundary line fixed by the sheriff. Arizona Pete, the bad man, later accomplishes a good deed when he accompanies the son of one of his enemies across the dead line, when he had found the boy in a gambling dive in a neighboring city, drunk and fleeced of his money, but pays the penalty of death later when the sheriff shoots him down.

The two comedies coming next week are typical of the Essanay's Chicago product and of an ascending standard. "The Other Johnson" tells of a chap who receives word that he has fallen heir to an immense fortune. He is immediately oppressed by creditors, "touching" friends, beggars and charity solicitors, who make his life so much like a nightmare that he is only too happy when at the end of the day he receives a dispatch that he is not the right Johnson. "A Darling Confusion," which accompanies "The Other Johnson," is short but overflowing with the stuff that laughs are made of.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Vitagraph always gives you a run for your money, a square deal and a full reel. You want what you want when you want it, and that is the reason and the answer to the whole matter and the Vitagraph is always there with the goods, to wit, "The King's Funeral," and "The Reception to Colonel Roosevelt," which prove the wide-awake up-to-dateness of the concern who are always awake while the others sleep.

Did you see "Roosevelt" last Saturday? You didn't miss anything. The Vitagraph was there with its eagle eye and took in the whole show for you, so you can see it at any time. Teddy is right there as big as life and twice as natural. He almost steps out of the picture as he extends his hand and says: "Dee-lighted to meet you." Never has a motion picture so thoroughly caught the view of an event and its central attraction as has the "Reception to Colonel Roosevelt." The beauty of it is that you can see "Teddy" as closely and fully as if you were talking to him personally.

When he takes his place on the reviewing stand with Mayor Gaynor of New York, they are lifesize, a real life portrayal of these two celebrated and remarkable men. The meeting of the "Kaiserina" by the Revenue S. S. "Androscoggin" and the attending steamships, is immense. You can almost step aboard as they pass before you.

This week will see a two ringed circus hustle at the studios of the "V". Everybody busy portraying some of the most originally novel and excruciatingly funny comedies, evolving a number of surpassing dramatic surprises bearing the thumb marks of the master hand of the irreproachable "Life Portrayals."

"Old Glory" has stood by the nation; it is a winning salutation. We will stand by "Old Glory" first, last and always; it stands for an open door, the more the merrier. Announce it now, get your people "Old Glorified" and then show them "Old Glory," the most bewitching, appropriate, patriotic display ever shown or has ever graced a screen.

The Fourth of July must be celebrated. A Fourth without a celebration would be like a man without a country. The most effective way to celebrate the day we celebrate is to keep "Old Glory" before your patrons and you will find the people will stand and sit before "Old Glory" all day long. "Old Glory," red, white and blue posters are ornamental as well as useful. "Old Glory" will be released Saturday, July 2.

On Friday, July 1, "Saved By the Flag," a South American drama with a thrilling plot and picturesque setting. On the same film "Wilson's Wife's Countenance" will make this day's release a double-header, two in one, with a total length of 997 feet. "Wilson's Wife's Countenance" is a bright little comedy, with a big laugh and sharp satire.

THINGS SAID ABOUT VITAGRAPH.

Words aptly spoken are fitly spoken, and these are to the point. The Vitagraph Life Portrayals speak for themselves, but in confirmation of this we reproduce the word of a few of those for whom they have spoken.

Johannesburg, South Africa, May 1.

We are showing your picture "Cupid and the Motor Boat." We have used several of your pictures, including "Betty's Choice," "For Her Sake," "The Evil That Men Do" and "He Tried on Handcuffs." We consider your pictures the best in the market at the present day. We use every maker's and know what we are about. We are the largest circuit in South Africa.

We are users of all licensed films made and as a committee of one, representing twelve different houses, wish to compliment you on doing work that is soaring above the best pictures on the market.

E. A. YOUNG.

Chattanooga, Tenn., April 26, 1910.

Just a few lines to let you know that "St. Elmo" broke all records here, Saturday. As the plot was laid in the suburbs of this city it aroused a great deal of interest. I enjoy seeing the Vitagraph as my feature bill. Going to feature "The Vitagraph Girl" as soon as I can get orchestration for orchestra.

JOHN B. WETZEL, Bonita Theater.

Binghamton, N. Y., June 5, 1910.

Gentlemen—I have just received your Vitagraph Bulletin for this month and it's a peach. It is just like your pictures—the best. I run a small motion picture house and my patrons are crazy over Vitagraphs. Since seeing your films and your leading people there is nothing to it but Vitagraph.

DANIEL GARDNER, La Nue Theater.

Elwood, Ind., June 7, 1910.

Dear Sirs—We advertise all the Vitagraph productions because they are all features. I have failed to see a poor Vitagraph in six months. Kindly allow me to congratulate your company on your well earned efforts.

H. F. MOSIMAN, Lyric Theater.

Greenfield, Mass., June 8, 1910.

I wish to pay you a well deserved compliment upon your work and its grand results. The Vitagraph features are becoming, or I may safely say, have truly become the talk of the town, and I have the pleasure of hearing a great many glowing tributes paid the superb acting and quality of your valued pictures.

Therefore, I am highly gratified to find your subjects included in my program. "The Special Agent" created widespread favor among our people. I am now looking forward to showing your following success "The Closed Door," which is to be lectured by Ray Hope, a Vassar College Girl this Wednesday and Thursday. It will be an added feature. Wishing you continued success,

HERBERT STREETER, Bijou Theater.

ANOTHER FAMOUS PERSONAGE IN THE MOVING PICTURE RANKS.

Everybody knows Sam Loyd. From the smallest schoolboy to the oldest grandma, they know him as the famous puzzle man of the New York Evening Journal, The Ladies' Home Journal, and a dozen other leading publications. By his excellent work Sam Loyd has won an enviable place in the hearts of the American public; his name is a byword in millions of homes, and his puzzles are looked to with pleasure and delight by children and grown-ups alike. Realizing the great popularity of this famous genius, Mr. Joseph F. Coufal, proprietor of the enterprising Novelty Slide Company, has at a great expense entered into a contract with Mr. Loyd, whereby the well-known puzzle man will design and construct all Novelty Puzzlettes released from this date on. This is a valuable arrangement and another instance of the mighty efforts being made by up-to-date manufacturers to give the moving picture public the very best that money and brains can secure. If the leading papers and magazines admit the value of Sam Loyd's puzzles and use same regularly, surely the progressive exhibitor will quickly realize the value of Sam Loyd's Novelty Puzzlettes as an added attraction to his program. That picture patrons will appreciate this novel method of presenting puzzles is an assured fact, and it is equally positive that the exhibitor will benefit accordingly. For the present, one set of Puzzlettes will be released each week; later on the output will be increased. Each series will be strictly original and the subject highly interesting, instructive and amusing. The Novelty Slide Company, New York City, will be pleased to mail weekly descriptions of new releases regularly to all interested. The first set, "Changing Letter Series," is released this week.

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK.

We mentioned the Thanhouser "Thelma" at some length in last week's issue, and this week we want to say a word about the second release of the week in question. On Tuesday, "Thelma" is issued, and on Friday is that second release which we feel will set a new standard for realism in motion picture production. It is called "The Governor's Daughter," and little Marie Eline plays the part of the daughter. And now to those scenes, the realism of which still stands out in our memory—which is the kind of realism that counts. The scenes were portrayals of a train crash and they gave you startling before-and-after wreck views. They made you shiver when they showed you the fate that came to a carful of passengers—sudden, cruel and without warning. They made you shiver; they brought a fear-stroke to your heart. You winced, you clutched the arms of your chair—you tried to feel that it was no car chair but only a handy seat in the inspection room of a moving picture establishment. And you thanked God that the thing before you was only a picture on a screen!

THE SECOND ATLAS RELEASE.

Following their excellent bow to the trade with "The Outlaw's Redemption," the Atlas Film Company (selling through the Sales Company) now offers "Settling a Boundary Dispute." To say that this is an excellent production is putting it but mildly. The film is even an improvement on the first picture, and judging from both, the Atlas brand will be ranked in the first division. Their actors know their business, and there is none of the jerky movement that unfortunately has been so evident in the work of beginners. The outdoor scenes are particularly deserving of mention. Notwithstanding anything that may be said of the fickleness of the public taste, the public will never tire of viewing beautiful scenery, in connection, of course, always with an interesting story. From the pictures, one cannot help but wonder whether the Atlas people purposely planned an effect with stunning scenery? If they did, they have succeeded. More Atlas productions are entirely welcome. The Sales Company may easily consider the Atlas a valuable acquisition to their program.

MUGGSY'S FIRST SWEETHEART

True Love's Course Ran Anything But Smooth

A delightful Biograph comedy showing the experiences of Muggsy and Mabel. After gaining her consent he calls, but, curse the luck! he sits in a chair just varnished and when he arises he leaves a portion of his clothing glued thereto. To beat it is his only recourse, and he thinks his dream of love is o'er. Not so, for Mabel writes and apologizes, asking him to call again. This time he encounters the National Uplift Committee, and thinking them burglars throws them out. When he learns their identity, he feels he is now dished for good, but he is voted a hero when they realize that the Committee had overstepped the bounds of reason in wanting to destroy many treasured articles, which they in the uplift deem sinful.

MUGGSY'S FIRST SWEETHEART.—The most important age of the seven ages of life is the third. "The lover, sighing like a furnace, with a woeful ballad made to his mistress' eyebrow." This is the period at which we dare not call our soul our own. Love is life's game of draughts, with Cupid as vis a vis, and though we play with poignant perspicacity we are sure to succumb to the unerring skill of that little unclothed post-master. Muggsy has arrived at the third station, and of course is in a susceptible mood when little Mabel Brown passes. Kids together, they always experienced an attraction one for the other, and now, before he realizes it, Muggsy is in love, as is also Mabel. He braves the derision of his youthful companions, who have not as yet been stung by Cupid's dart, and escorts her home. Arriving at the Brown domicile, Muggsy asks if he might call in the evening; to this she gives consent. During the afternoon Mr. Brown, Mabel's father, has varnished a chair and set it in the reception room, he thinks, out of Mrs.'s way. At Muggsy's home there are great doings dressing Muggsy up in his new spring suit. He is mother's own dear boy and she wants him to look well. The girls conspire against poor Muggsy for he is ushered into the sitting-room and, of course, seats himself in the varnished chair, so when he arises he leaves his coat and a portion of his trousers flattened. The father helps him out with a suit of his clothes which are about three times too large for him. Thus attired, he reaches home gloomy indeed, for he feels that he has lost Mabel forever. However, there is a ray of sunshine in a letter from Mabel, for she sees that Muggsy has been cruelly victimized. On his way to the house he meets Mabel, and together they enter just after the National Uplift Committee has called. This Committee is on a crusade against all things that are degenerating, vulgar or harmful to the young, and Mrs. Brown joins the movement and consents that they remove anything of that character from her home. They have just started the uplift when the young lovers enter. Seeing these strangers packing the tabooed articles into baskets, they are mistaken for burglars and Muggsy throws them out bodily. When he learns the real identity of his victims, Muggsy feels he is in bad again, but the Browns, upon looking through the baskets and finding some of their most treasured articles lifted in the uplift, consider Muggsy the hero of the day.

A CHILD'S IMPULSE.—Many are the occasions where we are impressed with the egregious power of the little child in the affairs of life. They are indeed God's greatest representatives, for no agency has worked more good. The tiny hand of the child has ever pointed the way along the path of righteousness, and has ever been the powerful influence in our high standard of morals. In this Biograph subject is shown how a little child saves two souls—one from moral destruction, the other from mental anguish. Mrs. Thurston, a socially ambitious widow, is holding one of her famous Bohemian parties. To these functions are invited the leading lights of the several professions—actors, artists, musicians, etc. Surrounded by these men and women of art and letters, she was at first entertained, but they soon palled and bored. On this evening in particular, she is especially possessed of ennui, until the appearance of Raymond Hartley, a wealthy young bachelor, who is introduced into the circle by a newspaper man. An attachment immediately springs up between the widow and Raymond, and it must be said that the latter is more sincere than the former, for Raymond calls upon her and proposes marriage, which she is only too willing to accept. His friends, however, upon finding out the seriousness of the situation, go and warn him against her, accusing her of being a flirt. He, of course, will not believe until he himself later finds their accusation true. His friend and chum suggests a stay in the country to cure him of this ominous infatuation. Selecting a quiet out of the way place they go, enjoining the valet to keep secret their whereabouts. Almost upon their arrival, he meets Grace, the daughter of the farmer. Her simple, artless manners, with her rustic beauty, fairly captivate him and make him forget the widow entirely. He now experiences a higher and holier love, so he sends word to his valet to send on his trunks as he intends protracting his stay indefinitely, and later proposes to Grace and gains consent. The widow, meanwhile, has waxed uneasy, as she is most anxious to make this rich match, realizing what Raymond's wealth would do for her. At his residence she gets little information from the valet, but espying the trunk tagged, she slyly notes the address. Off she goes in her auto, and finds Raymond on the roadside in a state of elation over his prospects. Feigning illness, she elicits his sympathy, and soon the old infatuation possesses him. Back to the city he goes with the widow, after dispatching a note to Grace of his departure. What a shock this is to the poor girl, and her little sister, while she doesn't quite understand why, feels that the return of Raymond is urgent. The trunks have arrived and the little one finds the return stub still intact. Getting her toy bank, she extracts her savings and finds she has sufficient to pay fare to the city. Surreptitiously she starts, and when in the city a policeman directs her to Raymond, whose valet states he is at the widow's. Here the child enters into the midst of a Bohemian gathering. One look into the child's sweet face, so much in contrast to the features around him, and but the sound of one word of her pleading, is enough to decide him. So picking up the child in his arms he dashes from the place, hurling aside the widow, who would detain him. Back to the farmhouse he rushes and throws himself appealingly at the feet of the poor heart crushed Grace.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE LITTLE FIDDLER.—The Little Fiddler plies up and down the street by day, playing his simple melodies and receiving whatsoever the passersby choose to bestow upon him, and at night comes home to his mother with his day's earnings, tired and worn but happy in her tender love. Far into the night the brave young mother sits sewing at her machine till her eyes ache and human strength gives way to the call of sleep. With weary head bent upon her arms she slips into dreams of the past.

Slowly the room fades into another in the luxurious home to which she was brought a bride. She is singing a cradle song over a baby's crib when her husband comes in drunk, and here follows that sad scene which is enacted in hundreds of homes every day. A woman's strong, brave love is pleading for the man of her bridal day, but still clinging to this drunken being of now, trying with her love to call back the gallant, handsome boy she loved so well. But drink has deadened all his memory of the past, and throwing her from him he goes reeling from the room.

The door slams and behold the room is changed again, and the sad, weary woman stands looking down at a basket of clothing where in her dreams a few moments before stood a tiny baby's crib. Sinking by the bed, she clasps her hands across her sleeping boy and pours forth her evening prayer to God.

A gay, fashionable musicale is in progress, and among its guests we can see the man of the dream now grown slightly gray but still handsome. His eyes shift from one piece of glittering jewelry upon a woman's breast to another string of pearls around the hostess' neck. Though among this crowd of fashion and music lovers, we instantly realize that he is not of them either in heart or feeling, but a common thief who plies his trade among surroundings of luxury and riches. There is a lull in the conversation, and through the open casement are heard the soft, sweet strains of a violin being played outside in the street. Nothing will do but the street musician shall be brought in and play for them. He proves to be none other than our little fiddler of the first scene, and it is there that father and son, unknown to each other, meet once again.

The "Little Fiddler" plays for the devotees of fashion, of whom the hostess in particular seems to take great interest in him. Sending for her silver purse she gives him money and also takes his name and address, with a view of looking after his future welfare. With presents of money and many compliments for his skill with the violin the thankful little fellow leaves the place. While the boy was playing his sweetest music the father had managed to steal the silver purse filled with jewels. Shortly after the lad leaves the purse is missed. The thief accuses his own son of the crime.

One hour later we are shown the thief in his own apartments. He takes out the silver purse and begins to count his gain, when a card falls from his pocket. As he sees written upon it his own son's name and address the truth comes to him—"The Little Fiddler" is his own boy! Back through the maze of crime and years comes into view the vision of the woman he once loved and honored. She stretches out her arms to him as in the days of long ago. He drives the sight from him and in its place his boy kneels before him, his hands fastened together with bands of steel. The thief stands staring into the dark future that yawns before him.

It is late that night when the anxious mother awaits the return of her little son. He comes and throws into her lap his gifts of money, and they are both rejoicing when suddenly the door is thrown open and the hostess and host of the musicale enter, followed by an officer of the law. The boy is accused of having stolen the silver purse and has just been torn from the arms of his mother, when in the door appears the father—the thief. He confesses his guilt and stands awaiting his punishment, when the small, soft hands of his own boy stretch forth asking for mercy and forgiveness. The appeal reaches the hearts of the hearers, and for the boy's sake the man is given his freedom. The door closes softly on the departing members of the world of fashion, and husband and wife once again look into each other's eyes. A soul is saved; and we feel sure that out of the darkness will come forth a MAN who will bring peace and happiness into the life of one woman and the little curly-headed boy beside her.

CHICKEN SPELLS CHICKEN. Rastus wanders to a country store one morning and, eager to secure a box of beautiful posies [illegible] appetite for chicken sets him to speculating as to how he can obtain one of the hens. Rastus loves chicken and knows and when he arrives at the store he is asking for just one of the hens on the yard and his temptation is overpowering. Continually eyeing the old hen as about to pounce upon her, while the proprietor of the store dozes out, and leaves him to his fate.

Rastus hops away heartbroken when suddenly his interest is aroused again as he passes a young woman, who has purchased the fowl that he had contemplated appropriating for himself. He turns about and follows her stealthily, thinking. Maybe that chicken will break away. The young lady stops to chat with a neighborhood politician, who, seeing Rastus loitering, [illegible] on his way. Disappointed but hopeful, Rastus turns up an alley and stops just outside a tenement house when he hears the faint clucking of a hen, sounds suspiciously like chicken talk. He peers through a knothole in the fence and turns back slowly when one of the young pullets flutters up to perch on the fence, then hops down at his very feet.

Fortune has smiled on Rastus at last. He makes a wild scramble for the bird but it flutters out of his hands and starts wildly out of the alley with Rastus at its heels. The chase is a hot and furious one and in the end Rastus corners his quarry, and grabs it by the flopping wing. With a smile of triumph he holds it in his hands when suddenly, as though by magic it disappears. The frightened colored man stares in amazement. Evidently "dat chicken was cengered." He turns and runs out of the alley, anxious to leave this witch-ridden neighborhood.

PAT AND THE 400. The household of the fashionable Bradley Larkins is suffering an extremely bad attack of ennui, due, no doubt to a lull in social activities. Mrs. Bradley Larkin, racking her brain for some new method of excitement, is about to give up in despair when the following paragraph from the morning's paper catches her eye.

SLUMMING IS BECOMING MORE FASHIONABLE.

Members of the Four Hundred are being kept busy making calls upon and ministering to the poor of Carnegie Alley.

"Ah, just the thing," exclaims Mrs. Bradley-Larkin. And that afternoon, having enlisted a number of her fashionable friends and with [illegible] auto loaded down with hothouse grapes, sofa pillows and other unnecessary luxuries, they alight in front of the dingy shanty which is the property of one Patrick Murphy.

Now Pat and his family despite their poverty are happy. They have plenty to eat, a place to sleep, while Pat gets his customary "can" and his pipe of tobacco every evening. Pat is happily engaged in blowing off the "suds," with the children romping about him, when the door opens and in burst on this happy scene Mrs. Bradley Larkin, Mrs. Pink Pinkley, et al.

Mrs. Bradley-Larkin, assuming leadership of the party, offers her presents, then sees the beer on the table, and reprimanding poor Patrick for the use of the vile liquid while his children are in want, throws the contents out the door. She also finds a sprinkling of dust on the mantelpiece and lifts her eyebrows questioningly to Mrs. Murphy. Then reminding the Murphy family of how thankful they ought to be, the slumming party sweeps majestically out.

"Well, I'll be——," Pat begins.

"Did yez iver see the loike?" Mrs. Murphy interjects.

Again the door opens and a crowd of Pat's curious friends enter. After much discussion one of the crowd offers a paper which contains the following notice:

Grand musicale given in honor of Sr. Compannisky, the celebrated pianist, at the Bradley Larkin mansion at 2 P. M., to-morrow.

A happy thought comes to Pat. He suggests that they go slumming to the home of Mrs. Bradley-Larkin. This scheme is eagerly agreed to and Pat's guests depart to arrange for the swell affair.

The next afternoon, while Sr. Compannisky is seated at the grand piano in Mrs. Bradley Larkin's drawing room thrumming out crescendos and earsplitting fortissimos, a strange caravan, composed of dump carts, comes driving up the driveway and pauses under the port cochere. It is Pat Murphy and his delegation from Carnegie Alley on a little slumming expedition of their own.

The scene which follows is hilarious to the extreme. Pat and his friends, paired off in neat couples, stroll into the drawing room. Straightaway couples stroll into the drawing room. Straightaway Pat turns over the hothouse grapes, sofa pillows, etc., to Mrs. Bradley-Larkin, adding a few presents of his own choice. They forcibly persuade Sr. Compannisky to drink beer out of the pail while the goat, happy and contented, munches the music sheets which have dropped from the piano. Then Lizzie Murphy, pride of the alley, seats herself in the seat of the vanquished senor and rattles off a little Irish rag while Pat and his friends dance happily.

Then satisfied their revenge is complete, they bid Mrs. Bradley Larkin, Mrs. Pink-Pinkley and the others a fond adieu and go out.

THE BAD MAN'S LAST DEED.—The Western releases, described in this guide, are noteworthy in their strong plots and intensely dramatic situations. This story is keenly interesting from the first foot to the last. Like the others it is picturesque in its scenic settings and is superbly photographed.

Arizona Pete, typical bad man, is the hero of the story. The first scene shows him leaving his shack, after adjusting his pistol. He rides into town, enters a saloon and orders drinks for the crowd. A young chap, just out from the East, refuses to drink with him, but is finally persuaded by the cracking of Arizona's pistol aimed at his heels.

Pete, now happily inspired by a liberal quantity of "Old Henry," hearing that there is a dance in town, mounts and rides around to the dance hall. Here are gathered the young men and women of the town, dancing merrily to the tune of old Uncle Eb's squeaky violin. Pete enters and breaks up the dance, but during the melee that follows Pete is shot in the pistol hand and deprived of his weapon. A young girl, feeling sorry for the misguided fellow, offers to bind his wound and he consents. She is the sister of the young Easterner of a few scenes before.

The sheriff, who has been apprised of Arizona's latest misconduct, resolves that the bad man has held sway long enough in his county, so, organizing a posse of citizens and armed with a petition and plenty of horse-pistols, he rides off to Arizona's shack to inform the latter that there is one too many bad men in Mariposa County, and that he will find it healthier on the other side of the county line. In short, Arizona is threatened with instant death if he dares get in range of the gun of any citizen residing in the county. Arizona sees he is beaten and consents to leave the country. Accompanied by the sheriff and posse he rides to the boundary line, waves his hand and rides out of view. The boys congratulate themselves on having rid themselves of such a miscreant and turn about to ride back to town.

A few days later old Jim Wayman, the uncle of the two young Eastern people, asks Bob, the boy, to drive a herd of cattle across the county to the nearest market. Bob disposes of the cattle and is persuaded by a pal, accompanying him, to enter a gambling dive and take a hand at poker. Of course he is fleeced out of the entire roll which he obtained from the sale of the cattle and is about to leave despairingly when Arizona Pete enters. The bad man recognizes the boy and understands the situation, then forces the gambler who had fleeced the boy to return the money. In the exchange of the money, a locket which the boy had is turned over and Arizona recognizes in the face of the ornament the picture of the girl who had bound his hand when he had been shot at the dance hall. The boy explains that this is his sister.

Bob is thoroughly intoxicated and Arizona resolves to take him home.

An hour or two later they cross the boundary line and the bad man, aware that he is on deadly ground, trusts to luck to take him through without being seen.

They arrive at the ranch house and Bob is taken into the tender hands of his sister, who comes out later, followed by her uncle, to thank him for rescuing the boy.

The girl and her uncle, after shaking hands with the bad man, enter the house, and Arizona turns to leave. Just then the sheriff, stopping in the road, outside the yard, sees the trespasser and, raising his revolver, fires. Arizona whirls on his heel and falls in the dust. A moment later the girl runs out and is joined by the sheriff. She explains why the bad man broke his promise.

"I'm sorry, Pete—I didn't know," he says, taking the dying man by the hand.

"That's all right, sheriff," he answers, "it was comin' to me an' I got it. I was a bad man and you were a better shot."

Then he turns to the girl and says he will be happy if he can take just one good thing with him. She bends over and kisses him and he dies with a smile on his lips.

THE ELDER SISTER.—Miss Dolly, the elder of three orphan girls, has taken upon herself the burden of keeping the household together and is finding it no small battle.

In spite of the hardships she persists in her efforts until she is observed by the wealthy Jean Dubois, who is immediately enamored and soon commences a series of investigations to obtain information regarding her.

He even attempts to make her acquaintance by introducing himself when he meets her on the street.

After meeting so many rebuffs that he is assured of her being worthy of his attention he finally contrives to become acquainted in a proper manner. He later marries the heroic girl, and gives her two little sisters a pleasant home with his wife and himself.

THE UNLIMITED TRAIN.—Suppose a seamstress should sew a bolt of cloth to the back of your skirt and you wore the array. Would it excite some comment on the street? Yes, it would.

This happens in the film. Everything is fearfully exaggerated, but it surely is funny all the way through.

ON THE THRESHOLD. This is a pretty story of the kindness of a child. She offers some food to a rough-looking man who comes to the house, but her nurse drives him away without it, and rebukes the child. In the night the child goes downstairs for her doll, and finds the visitor of some hours before, in the drawing room. He has come with intent to commit a burglary. The child, in its innocence, thinks the man has returned for the food, and gives him some. The burglar, touched by the kind action, takes the food and relinquishes his criminal intentions.

MOTORING AMONG THE CLIFFS AND GORGES OF FRANCE.—No description can give an adequate idea of the beauties of this narrow mountain pass. The road winds along the banks of a leaping mountain stream on either side of which rise high mountains covered with dense foliage.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

ST. PAUL AND THE CENTURION. Metella, the daughter of the Centurion Vicinius, loves one of her father's slaves, Caius by name. This youth is a Christian and in the habit of frequently visiting the meetings held by them in the hills outside the city walls. Paul has gathered about him a small body of the faithful and preaches to them often in this secluded part of the forest.

Metella, encouraged by her natural curiosity as to her sweetheart's secret excursions, one day follows him and learns her first lessons in Christianity.

She leaves her hiding place and hastens to her father's palace where she finds Vicinius, her stern parent, in great rage because Caius is absent from his task.

Vicinius now orders the slaves to take Caius to a nearby woods and there flog him.

After the cruel chastisement Caius is left lying alone in the forest where soon after Metella finds him. She assists her sweetheart to the camp of his friends where she is so impressed by their lives that she accepts the belief and is baptized.

When Caius has sufficiently recovered from his punishment he returns to his master and dutifully takes up his work in the household.

Soon Vicinius, the Centurion, receives orders from Nero to arrest all the Christians who have been meeting in the hills outside the city.

The soldiers are now called together and move upon the Apostle and his little band of followers. Although warned in due season Paul refuses to flee, but engages in prayer while awaiting the arrival of Vicinius and his soldiers.

Caius and Metella join their Christian friends, fully expecting to be imprisoned with them.

When the attack is made upon the unarmed worshipers they are astounded to see the soldiers stop with their weapons suspended while they listen to the divine words. Gradually the swords and spears are lowered and the entire company with their leader drop to their knees.

APACHE GOLD.—John Mills, a young prospector, takes advantage of an accident to Spring Blossom, the daughter of an Apache chief, to win her affections and get himself adopted as a member of the tribe and is married to the Chief's daughter. His interest in the woman is on account of the apparently inexhaustible store of gold the Apache possesses and when as a member of the tribe, he is shown the location of the placer mine he loads himself down with the precious metal and returns to his own people, forgetful of the little Indian girl who mourns his going. Some years later Mills, his money gone, secretly returns to the mine to replenish his store and is overseen by a member of the tribe. He is captured and with true Apache cruelty he is tied to a tree with water and food within reach of his one free hand. But to take food or water will result in the discharge of a gun, giving him his choice of quick or lingering death, though the Indians know that he will suffer as long as possible in the hope of rescue. A little Indian boy sprains his ankle so badly that he cannot move and in response to his piteous pleas Mills reaches for the water, knowing that his action will cause the discharge of the gun and enable the boy to approach the water with safety. At that moment Spring Blossom appears and releases her husband, telling him that the sacrifice that he was about to make was for the sake of their child. The now repentant Mills takes them away with him and they settle upon a farm bought with Apache gold far from the Apache camp.

FAITH LOST AND WON.—Don Devereaux, returning suddenly to the home of his fiancee for a pair of forgotten gloves, is shocked to find her in the arms of another man. His faith in women destroyed, he becomes a woman hater and his dislike of the sex causes him to seek the west where on a ranch of his friend Jenkins, he feels certain that the hated sex will not be seen. He is delighted to find that even the cook is a man on the Jenkins ranch and he is enjoying himself mightily until he encounters Emily Grey, who owns the ranch adjoining the Jenkins place. Several times incidents force Emily upon his attention and at last when he loses his footing and slips over a precipice it is Emily who discovers the body of the unconscious man on a ledge far below and when she had summoned help it is Emily who, because of her lighter weight, makes the descent and fastens the rope about the still form. Shock and exposure have brought on a fever and again it is Emily who nurses the sick man through the weary watches of the night and brings him back to health and strength. And finally it is Emily who brings back to him his faith in love for he finds that he is again assured that true love is the most precious gift if only love be true. It's a pretty western story with beautiful scenic settings done in splendid photography.

THE LITTLE PREACHER.—The cowboys and gamblers of Cripple Creek are very much interested in a pleasant whose appears one day in the saloon giving the information that the Rev. A. E. Cole is due to arrive from Glue Creek, and that services will be held in the saloon. The cowboys plan to give the preacher a warm reception but are disappointed when the rev. proves to be a pretty woman. They embarrassedly apologize and agree that religion must be a good thing if taught by such a charming woman.

The attendance at the services is large, and the bartender is almost deserted. The bartender is in despair and is on the point of closing up his business. He is urged against this measure by one steady patron, Joe Lane, who tries his best to bring the deserters back into camp.

The Rev. Cole learns of the efforts against her by this young scoundrel and so she takes pains to meet him. Great is the surprise upon both sides. Joe proves to be handsome, debonair and polite; and not the deep dyed villain she had anticipated.

On the other hand Joe is immensely pleased with the young theological student; and an acquaintance springs up which ripens into a love affair in a few days.

Joe is a hopeless case, according to the good minister's mind, and she decides that it is her duty to reform him, even if she has to marry him. Joe swears that this is the only way in which he can be reformed, and when he convinces her of this, they take a trip to th local justice of the peace who ties the knot.

In the meantime, with Joe attending the services regularly, the bartender has no customers; and so he closes the saloon, posts a notice of the suspension of business and prepares to leave for more congenial surroundings.

The cowboys have been exemplary in their conduct, but, when they discover that the object of their admiration has become Mrs. Joe Lane, they decide to become "back-sliders." In a body they attend the saloon, with their appetites whetted for the fruits of the wine cup.

Alas, they are greeted by the sign of suspension. They find the bartender, and, at the point of their revolvers, force him to open up and quench their thirst. He is firm in his determination to move, however, and so each takes a flask along against a future drought.

The little minister notices that evening that they are in a somewhat hilarious condition, and so she lectures them severely on their habits, aided and abetted by her stalwart husband.

Ashamed and impressed, the boys finally agree to exchange their flasks for prayer-books, and sit down to study their Sunday-school lesson. Tired nature asserts itself, however, and they gradually drop off to sleep, while a picture shows a gigantic spider industriously weaving a web over the door of the deserted saloon.

PATHE FRERES.

RIDING SCHOOL IN BELGIUM.—Somersaults over six horses drawn up in line, trick riding, obstacle jumping and so on are all feats that require agility and strength and the tackling of precipitous ravines on a horse is ticklish business. The cavalrymen shown are past masters in the art of managing their horses, and the film is bound to excite a large amount of admiration and wonderment.

THE GREAT TRAIN HOLD-UP.—A company of noted bandits following their leader through the woods arrive at a clearing where they dismount and he explains the details of his plan to rob the limited. In pursuance of his instructions they quietly approach and surround a lonely, isolated wayside station, and quickly overcoming the agent, bind him securely and lock him in the cabin. Proceeding about two miles up the track the leader disguises as a railroad man, and taking a red flag signals the limited to stop whilst the rest of the gang remain secret under cover of the woods alongside. As the heavy engine and train comes to a sudden standstill the men rush out of the cover, and before the crew or passengers can grasp the situation, they hold them covered with their guns. Some climb up into the cab to the engine and take care of the engineers, while others proceed to the baggage wagon and after a short fight with the expressman secure the bags of valuable mail, which they carry to a spot in the woods a few yards distant. Meantime the agent's son and daughter, as was their custom, have proceeded to the station with his dinner. They find him unconscious, and reviving him, soon ascertain what has taken place. It is the work of a few moments for them to see the bandits' tracks and following under cover of the woods, they arrive on the scene in time to see the mail bags being hidden in the woods. With the aid of his sister the boy takes his place inside an almost empty bag while she turns to get assistance. The mail having all been taken, the robbers line up the passengers and take their valuables, then bidding them re-enter the train and keeping all still covered with their guns, they order the engineer to put on full speed and get away. As soon as the train is out of sight they return for the mail and slinging it across their saddles proceed to their meeting place, a lonely log cabin in the depth of the dense woods. When there a quarrel arises between two of the bandits and during the excitement the boy cuts his way out of the mail bag, climbs on a horse and gallops back to the station. Here he finds the sheriff and his posse have just arrived and turns and leads them to where the bandits were hidden. Coming on them unawares, it is an easy task to surround them, and after a short skirmish to effect the capture of the survivors. After burning their log cabin they lead them off as captives to get the severe sentence they so richly deserve.

CAESAR IN EGYPT. Ancient Egypt has fallen into the hands of the mighty Caesar, who first meets Tagra and her daughters drawing water in their pitchers from the sacred river Nile. At the sight of the beauty of one of the daughters, Tsit by name, Caesar commands that Tagra and her daughters shall appear at the feast to be held that night in the palace. In the home of Tagra the Egyptians bitterly lament that they dare not disobey the tyrant's will, and in the evening the mother and the other daughter set out for the feast. Tsit remains behind, but Caesar, irate that his will should be thwarted, sends messengers to her to repair immediately to the palace. She obeys the command, but the Egyptians incensed resolve to burn the palace. Within the palace revelry runs high, and Tsit dances before the all-conquering hero and his guests. Suddenly an Egyptian glides in, the gleam of a lighted torch is seen, and the palace is fired. It soon becomes a burning furnace, the glowing walls fall and crush the hitherto victorious Romans, while the Egyptians save Tagra and her daughters. So ends the picture. The mise en scene bears the hall-mark of a consummate knowledge of the art and science of staging, and we present this film in the conviction that its indisputable merits will assure for it warm praise and a ready welcome.

SAVE US FROM OUR FRIENDS.—A village wedding is being celebrated in the garden of the hotel, and when the fiddlers strike up for a dance the bride and bridegroom retire to the quietness of one of the rooms to exchange confidences. Unluckily the best man detects them and calls upon the guests assembled to assist him in bringing their hosts back to the garden. What tricks are now played on the luckless couple you will have to look at the film to see; commencing with throwing cabbages at them down the chimney and directing water on them through a hose put against the window up to the time when they are taken to jail for assaulting the village constable the film is one continuous roar from beginning to end.

NAPOLEON.—It would be an impossibility even in three reels to give the complete history of this most wonderful man. In presenting this picture we have selected a few only of the best-known and most famous scenes in his life.

Commencing the story with a summer evening at Malmaison we see in progress one of the most magnificent fetes of the kind that took place only in France, during the height of Bonaparte's power, and at which are present Napoleon and Josephine.

Following this is the well-known scene when Napoleon on his rounds discovers a sentry asleep behind a haystack, takes up the latter's gun and continues his duties to the astonishment of the soldier when he awakes.

We next come to the battle of Austerlitz and the incident of the guard who was decorated by Napoleon for refusing to allow him to pass without the watchword. The battle itself is shown very vividly in all its varying phases.

The following scenes show the little King of Rome; Napoleon endeavoring to compel the Pope to sign an agreement annulling the latter's temporal power; the abdication of Napoleon and his subsequent farewell to his guards. Then follow scenes in connection with his imprisonment in St. Helena and finally his death in May, 1821.

The film is staged with the greatest accuracy as to detail in costume and setting. The magnificence of some of the scenes is marvelous, and where practicable the pictures have been taken on the spot. For instance, Napoleon bids farewell to his guards at Fontainebleau Castle, where the event actually happened.

REBELLIOUS BETTY.—We have already advertised the fact that Betty was coming, and now she is here and appears before you in the first of a series of comic films which should be a big feature in any house. Betty's antics and pranks are distinctly fresh and laughable, she is a mischievous and willful tomboy, who shrinks at nothing so long as she can get her own way. In this first film she succeeds in upsetting half a dozen people, destroys an artist's masterpiece, jumps upon and rides away with somebody else's bicycle, which she afterwards abandons for a horse and finally knocks off the head of the butler. All these things she does simply because she has been refused the privilege of accepting an invitation to go for a motor ride.

INSIDE THE EARTH.—A couple of Englishmen reach the middle of the earth accompanied by their guides. Here they find huge caverns covered with stalactites with gigantic mushrooms springing up spontaneously. Elephants innumerable, huge frogs, crocodiles and other monsters appear suddenly and the travelers flee in terror. After passing through streams of molten lava and fire they manage to return as if by miracle to the face of the earth again.

MAX FOILS THE POLICE.—With the aid of two friends Max carries off a damsel whose parents wish to force her into a distasteful marriage. Thereafter he checkmates the police at every turn and finally penetrates into the office of the chief of police. Here a struggle takes place between the two men. Max underneath his opponent is forced into a large chest, the struggle continues, the chief presently emerges, locks the box upon his captive, and gives instructions for the chest and the man inside to be incarcerated. The moment his subordinates have left the room to carry out his instructions, he removes his wig, and lo and behold it is Max, who calmly makes his way to the cell and turns the key upon the police and the real chief of the police inside the box. To inveigle his rival into stabbing a lifesize dummy of himself is Max's next act, and then having scared the guilty man pretty well out of his senses by his sudden apparition, this imperturbable outlaw finds time to turn his attention to the delights of lovemaking.

GO WEST, YOUNG WOMAN, GO WEST.—Mrs. Kelly runs a boarding-house in the western foothills, having principally as her clientele the cowpunchers that work thereabouts. She meets with no end of trouble in securing a suitable cook that is matrimonial proof, as the moment a fair queen of the pot and pan arrives she is besieged by the boarders, and invariably Cupid gets his work in. Finally Mrs. Kelly, growing desperate, sends to the city for a Chinese cook. This enrages the boarders, and when the cook arrives he is made to do a few hurried stunts to the tune of the six-shooter, and he likewise exits almost as gracefully as he entered.

About this time an out-and-out city girl writes she would accept the place, loudly denouncing Cupid and its darts. She arrives; the enemy reconnoiters the situation; she meets their proposals with scorn and derision, drives them away. But on second thought she decides Big Bill Parsons is her affinity, and again the trouble is rampant. Then, lo he came a busted actor. "Can you cook?" says Mrs. Kelly. He did—trouble brewing on every hand. To save the day Mrs. Kelly marries her new cook.

THE RED MAN'S WAY.—An Indian farmer and his wife protect and secrete a gambler who has injured a cowboy in a fight over a game of cards. The gambler repays the Indian by stealing the affections of his wife, a beautiful Indian woman of eighteen. Great is the dismay of the Indian on finding his wife in the arms of the white man whom he has befriended. His first thought is to kill the destroyer of his home; but he decides to give the squaw to the gambler and when she attempts to take her infant the Indian interposes. "You take the squaw; the child stays with me."

Five years later we see the effects of the union between the gambler and the squaw. He has become a confirmed drunkard and the squaw, through abuse, neglect and hardship, is dying. The Indian learns of this and his manner of vengeance is unique and gives this picture story its name, "The Red Man's Way."

THE HALL-ROOM BOYS.—In presenting the emperor of silent comedy, Mr. Fred Walton, in the above picture story, the acme of film comedy has been reached and no better vehicle than "The Hall-Room Boys" could have been secured for his advent into picturedom.

They are seen to enter the boarding house previous to preparing to attend the mask ball at the Union Club. Donned in their best, they take a taxi to the fountain of merriment. The formality of having the proper tickets of admission causes them no end of trouble but being thrown out of a public place fails to efface the redoubtable pair, and they pass an evening full of surprises and a few bumps—even if they were stung by the fair charmer—so, as the excitement draws to a close, they repair to their apartments, and dream of the eventful night. The morning after brings a fresh supply of trouble, they are informed their places at the ribbon counter have been filled completing one of the best comedies ever offered in moving photography.

THE SHERIFF. Tow Lawton and John Mason were rival candidates for office of County Sheriff. The election was near at hand and excitement plentiful. Mason was in love with Lawton's sister, but the feeling existing between the two men rendered their marriage impossible. When votes are counted Boveder County had elected John Mason as their sheriff, who took oath to do his duty as he understood the law.

Lawton becomes involved in trouble and a war

OLD GLORY. [illegible] Old Glory" [illegible] the emblem of Freedom. This is a marvellously realistic and impressive scene which presents the martyred President signing the Emancipation Proclamation, surrounded by Seward, Stanton, Johnson, and all the members of the cabinet, with a vision of slavery, suggestive of the spirit of the motive which leads us up to the surrender of General Lee to General Grant at Appomattox. "The Union Forever" and the reunion of the Blue and the Gray under the protecting folds of "Old Glory" and the brotherhood of man.

Once more we are reminded of "Old Glory's" progress and power at the storming of San Juan Hill, with Teddy Roosevelt in command the surrender of the Spanish outpost and the hoisting of the Grand Old Flag on the summit of the hill, a beacon of hope and cheer. At this point we are brought to the grand climax the Star Spangled Banner waving in all its majesty and glory o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave, calling forth responsive thrills of inborn patriotism that can only find relief in an outburst of irresistible and uncontrollable applause.

SAVED BY THE FLAG.—In the hot sun of South America the hands employed by Hampton, an American ship owner and planter, are lazily wiling away their time when the planter unexpectedly appears upon the scene and reprimands the foreman for neglecting his duty and not urging the men to get the cargo aboard the boat that she may start her voyage on scheduled time. The foreman answers back angrily and is at once discharged by the planter.

Embittered and embarrassed, the foreman decides upon revenge which is more fully aroused when he sees his sweetheart talking to the planter who seems to be attracted by the pretty Creole. While watching the loading of the vessel, a messenger arrives and hands the planter a message from an old friend, Captain Gillet, of the United States Cruiser, that he has just landed his steamship in port and will take dinner with him.

The Captain and the planter are seated in the latter's garden, and while smoking and talking, Paola, the pretty Creole whom we saw in the first scene, passes by the house. The Captain urges his friend to go speak to her, while he waits for his return. Hampton goes to her and they walk out in the grove for some distance. The discharged foreman, with murder in his heart, is watching the lovers from behind a tree, and unobserved, shoots the girl in the back. While the planter goes for help, the foreman rushes forward and throws the pistol beside the prostrate girl, then runs for the guards, with whom he returns and accuses the planter of having shot her pointing to the pistol as evidence.

The planter is arrested and put in jail. Paola is carried to her home and placed under the care of a nurse. The foreman spreads the news of the attempted murder by the American planter and tries to rouse his countrymen to hatred and vengeance against him. He then leads the mob to the jail where they overcome the guards and take the American out to shoot him.

Paola hears from her nurse of the plight of her lover. She insists upon getting out of her bed and going to his rescue. Sick and weak with hovering death she hastens to tell Captain Gillet of Hampton's danger. The Captain sends a messenger in all speed to the American Consul who gives orders to the captain to save the latter at all cost. With the American flag the Consul jumps in his automobile and starts for the place where the mob are preparing to shoot their victim.

Now Let's Kill It

We can kill off that $104 "royalty" proposition sure pop—kill it so dead that it will make Old Mamma Ten Percent seem like a live corpse in comparison. To be brutally frank, any exhibitor who pays $104 in advance for a year's license to breathe is an unmitigated chump, and he knows it in his heart. Meanwhile, if you are good and sick of worrying and wondering what new stunt the trust will spring next, throw off your shackles, throw out your chest, stiffen up your backbone and become really independent. I'll give you the grandest film program you ever saw, heard or dreamed of.

The Captain of the cruiser, with a company of marines, goes to the rescue, two able bodied seamen carrying Paola. They arrive in time to place the flag across the breast of Hampton and defy the mob to shoot at their own peril. The crowd falls back in awe, and before they can recover themselves they are driven off by the Captain and his men. Hampton is released and clasps Paola in his arms amid shouts of the boys in blue and white.

WILSON'S WIFE'S COUNTENANCE. — Wilson glances at his wife, who returns his greeting with an expression like a piece of cheese. He takes his seat at the dinner table, opens his newspaper and reads with much excitement about a terrible explosion. Again she looks at him with jack o'-lantern stare and blank gaze. He becomes frantic and tells her if she does not change her face he will put an end to himself. She inanimately stops his hands, but retains the inane glare. He hurries from the room and sends a note to his old friend, Dr. Jackson, asking him to send something to relax his wife's fixed features and give him relief, a stimulus and nerve tonic to stir her to normal activity.

A messenger from the doctor brings a box of pills with directions how to use them as a sure cure for Mrs. Wilson's ailment. Wilson is delighted, and communicates his joy to his wife, who idiotically recognizes the cause of his ecstasy and agrees to submit to his ministration. Wilson thinks if one pill is good, three will be better and quicker. One, two, three—and then he awaits results.

The pellets begin to work: so does his wife's face. Oh! horrors! The man with a thousand faces would hide them all in shame. Wilson's wife's face has them all beaten a mile for rapid changes and funny grimaces until gradually her countenance assumes a sweet, natural smile and normal flexibility and intelligence. Wilson is jubilant and radiant in his joy and the restoration of his wife's health. A parting glance at the smiling face of Mrs. Wilson shows us that she shares her husband's happiness.

ECLAIR.

JULIET WANTS TO MARRY AN ARTIST.—Juliet declares most positively to all her aspiring young beaux that she will condescend to marry no one but a real, live artist! Accordingly, our hero hastens to devise a means whereby he may make himself eligible, and finally decides to take advantage of an opportunity that is afforded him to become a comedian. The contract is speedily signed, and our sanguine friend retires to dream of the success which lies before him.

We next behold the Irrepressible in the midst of his perplexities "Behind the Scenes," in which mystic situation he has come to the conclusion that "Distance truly lends enchantment," and all is not quite so glittering as when gazed upon from the other side of the footlights. Still, he is borne up by the happiness which awaits him, and his tribulations assume the weight of a feather, until—some news is brought him—sad, sad news, his dear beloved Juliet has forgotten her vow to wed an artist, and has consented to become a countess. Then all is chaos—oblivion slowly closes in!

FAUST.—This entrancing story, drawn from the world-renowned tragedy of Goethe, opens in the mysterious working den of Dr. Faust, who, old and worn out with years of stern study, and on the verge of despair through longing for the pleasures of his bygone youth, all of which he has surrendered to his learning, thinks of resorting to poison in order to end the weariness of his declining days. He, however, dashes down the cup at the last moment, and calls upon the infernal powers to aid him. Immediately Mephistopheles appears and offers him youth and pleasure in exchange for the surrender of his soul. Faust, dazzled by the splendor of the vision which is shown to him by his alluring companion, accepts the compact, signs the fatal paper, and is at once transformed into a handsome young man.

Mephistopheles then shows Faust the beautiful Marguerite, and immediately he falls desperately in love with the innocent girl. Finally, aided by the perfidious suggestions of his companion, Faust succeeds in winning the heart of poor Marguerite.

Valentine, eager to revenge his sister's honor, is killed in a duel by Faust, who seeks safety in flight. Betrayed, deserted, demented from sorrow, the unfortunaate Marguerite is thrown into a dungeon and left to her grief.

Meanwhile, Mephistopheles endeavors to make Faust forget the unhappy girl, but in vain; love has overcome the powers of evil, and all his magic is in vain. Faust hastens to the prison and seeks Marguerite; his passionate words of love restore her for a moment to reason, but only for a moment, she is just able to offer him forgiveness, and then dies in his arms.

Rarely has there been a better representation of this wonderful drama. The pitiful story of Marguerite and Faust makes its appeal to all humanity, and words cannot add to its charm and effectiveness.

THE KING OF THE BEGGARS.—Under the porch of the Basilique, the King of Beggars is receiving the tithes of his subjects, all of whom come forward to hand over to their sovereign the products of their day's work, begging in the streets. We then follow the King home, under cover of the night. He enters a dark underground dungeon, he crosses the dingy cellar, enters what appears to be a cupboard, tugs at something, and ascends from sight. In fact, he has entered an elevator, and is carrid aloft where he alights in a magnificent apartment, and is received by his domestic attendants, who wait upon him with signs of deep attention—the King of Beggars is no other than the Duke of Amblois.

There is a feast at the residence of the Marquis of Monbarlin. The Marquis has lost all his fortune, and therefore refuses to give the hand of his daughter to the Squire of Valangis as his fortune is small, notwithstanding the fact that he and the young girl dearly love each other. The wealthy and pompous Duke of Amblois asks the Marquis for his daughter's hand, and is readily accepted by the father, but the young lady repulses him, as she will have none but the beloved Squire. The Duke becomes enraged and swears revenge. Later on Valangis endeavors to appoint a rendezvous for himself and Juliet, but all his plans are thwarted by the beggars over whom the Duke reigns supreme. The Duke succeeds in getting the girl to his apartment, but immediately he receives word that the house is surrounded by the police; he hastens to the underground regions, where he hides Juliet, and returns to his rooms, only to find the officers waiting to arrest him. In his surprise, he makes a false step backward and falls through the elevator shaft, landing at the feet of Juliet and her lover, the young Squire, who has succeeded in finding his dear beloved. A moment later the Marquis arrives, and realizing the worth of the Squire, unites his hand with that of beautiful Juliet. Then the men all uncover their heads before the dead body of the villainous Duke of Amblois.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.—A mining engineer, Frank Noyes, marries a western girl and takes her to New York to live. After two years have passed the wife gets hold of a letter written to her husband by another woman. She goes back to her Western home, taking with her her little baby girl. The mother dies. The girl grows up under the care of her grandfather into a beautiful young woman.

Dave Hardy, a young farmer, loves May and in a very pretty scene in the woods they are betrothed. They come back to announce their engagement to the grandfather, only to learn that May's father, who has neglected her all of these years has become wealthy, and he is coming out to take her back East to be educated as a lady.

Noyes comes and takes his daughter with him, leaving poor Dave broken-hearted.

In New York a wealthy young swell falls in love with May and is about to propose marriage to her when the butler brings in to May a package containing her old sun bonnet and a letter which reads: "Dear May: I am sending your sun bonnet before Dave kisses it into shreds. We miss you terribly. Grand-dad." The girl is deeply touched. She leaves her swell admirer, puts on her hat and takes the train back to her old home.

THE MAN BEHIND THE CURTAIN.—George Roberts is a confidential clerk of a banking house. He is to sail for Europe in the morning on an important mission, and one thousand dollars in cash is given him to pay expenses.

He goes to a poker party and gambles away the money. Back in his room, he realizes the awful folly he has committed, which means loss of position and disgrace to him. He determines to get the money back from Johnson, who won heavily. Roberts enters Johnson's home. Johnson's wife enters. Roberts conceals himself behind the curtain. He writes on a cuff, "You must get one thousand dollars from your husband when he enters, persuade him to leave the room and give me the money. If you don't get the money, I will shoot your husband." He throws the cuff on the floor and Mrs. Johnson reads the message.

A terrible and dramatic situation follows when the terror-stricken wife tries to persuade her husband to give her the money which he has won without explaining to him. The husband surmises something is wrong. He gives his wife the money and starts to go out of the door. He sees the curtain move, pushes his wife through the door, grabs the arm behind the curtain, and, after a terrific struggle, he gets the revolver and unmasks the man. Roberts pleads with Johnson to release him. He shows the letter, and Johnson relents. He gives the boy his money and bids him go.

THE LADY DOCTOR.—Miss Julia May is a physician. She is also very pretty. She opens an office in a small Western town. The cowboys all fall in love with her and pretend various ills and aches in order to get next to Julia. Julia is wise to their game and the funny stunts she makes them do will win laugh after laugh from any audience.

ON THE BORDER.—Pedro Valdez has a ranch just across the United States border. He also has a beautiful daughter, Arnita. Some cowboys stop at the Valdez home and enjoy its hospitality.

After dinner, one of the cowboys, Ugly Ike, tries to get gay with Arnita. The father comes out, and sees the girl struggling in the ruffian's arms. He pushes Ike, who draws a pistol. Valdez stabs the cowboy, and believing him dead, the father and daughter mount their horses and ride away, to be pursued later by the cowboys, who swear vengeance. Here follows one of the best and most exciting horse-back chases that has ever been put into a picture. The riders are all experts, and the horses are real broncos.

Valdez and his daughter get away from their pursuers and take refuge with Dan Blake, the sheriff of the county, who saves them from the cowboys and escorts them back to their home, where they learn that Ugly Ike was not killed. The cowboys ride off. The sheriff falls in love with the beautiful Arnita. He is brave enough when it comes to fighting men, but in the love game he is very backward. He writes a letter to the girl telling her that he loves her, and saying that he will call for her answer the next day.

Here follows a pretty love scene with some delightful comedy, when the sheriff finds the girl being kissed and embraced by young Alvarez, her Mexican lover.

Back in his old home the sheriff removes all his finery and slowly tears up the first and only love letter he ever wrote.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

TEMPEST AND SUNSHINE. Planter Middleton, of Kentucky, has two beautiful daughters, one of whom is known as "Tempest," and the other as "Sunshine," because of their different dispositions. "Sunshine" is wooed by Bill Jeffreys, the village postmaster, whom she does not love and rejects.

Later her heart is won by young Doctor Lacey from New Orleans. Soon after they become engaged, the Doctor is compelled to return to his home city on business. During his absence, "Tempest," who is in love with him, conspires with Bill Jeffreys to intercept the lovers' letters. They succeed in making Julia and the Doctor each think that the other is untrue.

The Doctor, in a spirit of pique, decides to marry "Tempest." Sunshine remains true, and confides to no one the sorrow she feels. Just as Tempest and the Doctor are about to be married, the ceremony is interrupted by Jeffreys, who confesses the plot—having left a sick bed to do so. The guilty ones are forgiven, and the lovers reunited.

THE FLAG OF HIS COUNTRY. Walter Scott [illegible] New York home, engaged to a Southern girl. At the opening of the play their baby daughter is christened, and the young couple are happily in their home in Baltimore. This is in 1861, at the opening of the Civil War.

At the first rumors of conflict Miss North's brother enlists in the ranks of the Confederates. When North refuses to follow his example and casts his lot with the Union Army, his wife bids him good-bye forever. She asks him to choose between his flag and her. He chooses Old Glory and goes to war.

Four years later when he returns he finds his old home deserted, and although he tries in every way to discover the whereabouts of his wife and child, he is unsuccessful. He moves to a Northern home and there becomes Commander of a G. A. R. post.

Mrs. North, who believed that her husband was killed in the war, comes North with her brother and her little grandchild to attend a reunion of the Confederate Veterans and the G. A. R. While out walking with her grandmother, the little girl is lost, and is picked up by North on his way to attend the reunion. Through the police the grandmother and uncle are notified of the whereabouts of the child, and when they come to claim her at the G. A. R. post, there are mutual recognitions, and Mr. and Mrs. North are reunited. There is but one flag now, the Blue and the Gray clasp hands beneath its folds.

LUX FILMS.

A QUIET PIPE.—Jones and his friend are taking a quiet pipe when they have a bet as to who will smoke the most tobacco in a certain time.

Smoke is seen coming from the window of the house and a general stampede takes place, causing roars of laughter to the spectators of this extremely funny film.

CHARLES THE FIFTH.—Charles the Fifth of France is soon to be pressed by his chamberlain to secure the throne for himself. Having an interview with the conspirators, they induce him to accept the crown. To secure the silence of the Queen, she is given poison by the chamberlain, which produces madness, but at the same moment, her lady in waiting enters and guesses the crime. Immediately she is overpowered and taken prisoner with the mad Queen. The loyal lady manages to escape by a rope from the window of her prison and rushes to the King, imploring him on behalf of the poor lady. He is about to accede to her wishes when the chamberlain appears and the lady is thrust into prison whilst the King is influenced.

But the voice of conscience is too great. We see him tormented by pictures of his prisoner's treatment and, stung with remorse, he rushes to her aid and in spite of all the chamberlain's efforts, craves pardon of the mad Queen.

THE WITCH'S SPECTACLES.—A lady of considerable wealth and personal attractions is anxiously seeking a husband. She is not gifted to love, and after considerable perplexity, she sends an advertisement to the effect that a certain sage will read the future.

Visiting the witch she obtains a pair of spectacles that enable her to peer closely into the future. Then as the lovers one by one declare their passion she is able to see what the days to come would be like with each of them as her husband. A series of amusing revelations follow that lead to her rejecting all of them. In despair she wanders into the neighboring park, where she encounters a young mechanic who has sustained considerable injury to his hand. She takes a fancy to the young fellow and reads the future she wishes for in the witch's spectacles. At first the young fellow resists her advances and is loth to declare himself on account of his poverty, but love laughs at locksmiths, as he always will, and they are seen wandering hand in hand to the land of Goo-Goo.

"IMP."

THE FALLEN IDOL.—A country girl who comes to the city is usually considered prey by her more sophisticated cousins. Flo Green, when in dire straits, is befriended by an artist and soon their acquaintance is more than a passing one. He goes so far as to place a ring on her finger, and when he asks her not to wear it she consents, not knowing the significance of the request. But her eyes are opened later, when she attends a party at his studio, and the Bohemian atmosphere so shocks her that she dashes out in a rage.

Some time later, her younger sister comes for a visit from the country. She arrives at the house while Flo is away, and Flo's bastard sees her. He immediately begins to flatter her, and finally induces her to accompany him to the studio. Here he resumes his advances, and suddenly seizes her. Flo, who had divined this when she found nobody at home, now enters. The anguish of a beguiled woman who is trying to save her sister now confronts the rogue in all its fury, and he is overwhelmed at Flo's vigorous denunciation. Before he can recover, both have hurried from the room.

The great city has been too much for the simple country girls, their only offense having been the possession of pretty faces. They pack their belongings and we soon see them back in the country, to the simplicity that they now hail as a haven of safety.

THE CALL OF THE CIRCUS. A bad fall lays up Marie, the bareback rider, in the home of Rev. Strong, the parson in the little Western town. The quiet little sick-room sees visitors such as never were there before clowns, riders, ring masters, etc. Marie cannot recover in time to accompany the show out, and they leave her at Strong's house.

Strong takes a keen and kindly interest in her, and soon Marie recovers. She cannot yet join the show, so Strong helps her enjoy the quiet rural life. In doing so, however, he excites the gossip of a very circumspect element which takes a wrong view of his relations with Marie, and the affair culminates in a request that he either send Marie from the town, or leave it himself. He determines to stand by her, but she believes that he will sacrifice his career in so doing, so she awaits her chances, and when a traveling circus comes to town, the call of the tan-bark arena is strong—she steals out of the house and wanders out to the white tents. But Strong, missing her, guessed at her whereabouts and, following her quickly, not only finds her, but begs her to come with him to a place where none will point the finger of suspicion that springs only from evil minds. And she goes.

YANKEE.

THE GHETTO SEAMSTRESS.—The care-burdened souls that have struggled from out of the Czar's domain, only to encounter dire misfortune on these shores, are legion. But the future of Betsy Muscova looks bright, when with her aged father she leaves Russia, the only home she ever knew, and turns her face toward the Statue of Liberty, and David, her lover, promises earnestly that he will soon follow her.

Arriving here she settles down to work as a dressmaker, and true to plans, David comes through America's gates one year later. Will Betsy allow her lover to go to the sweatshops to grind out a living? No, not she. He must be a professional man a doctor. Accordingly he enters upon his studies, while Betsy toils patiently at the whirring sewing machine to meet expenses.

The new surroundings soon lose their novelty for David, and alas, he comes under new influences. His studies have thrown him into an environment far removed from the heroic Betsy and the machine that is yielding the wherewithal for his future.

A certain Clara Greenfield has entered into his life an accomplished girl of wealth and social position. He forgets Betsy, and soon preparations are under way for his marriage to Clara.

As if by fate, Clara's bridal gown is being made by Betsy and one day Betsy brings it finished to the fine Greenfield mansion. A chance glance through the portieres, she sees her David—a man who owes his all to her. She asks Clara who he is, and learning the truth, pours out her heart to her sister Jewess, as only a Jewess can.

The little Russian martyr has found a soft resting place for her confidences, for Clara is of lofty calibre, and one fine day when the thankless David stands under the wedding canopy, his love for his benefactress entirely forgotten, the ceremony is performed, and when the bride's veil is lifted, there stands—Betsy Muscova.

ATLAS.

THAT LITTLE GERMAN BAND.—Mr. Schmidt and several cronies are wont to meet in the back room of a neighboring saloon on Sunday evenings, at which time various brass instruments are produced and sounds unknown to musical ears drift out on the still night air. It's a good thing to have confidence in your own efforts—even if nobody else has.

Imbued with the desire to cultivate the musical taste of the public and incidentally earn a livelihood in the pleasing, easy life of the strolling player, the Little German Band invest their savings in startling uniforms and sally forth on their glorious mission. But things unforeseen are always happening their first adventure taking place in the backyard of a tenement.

Almost anybody can appreciate music, perhaps none better than the Irish, but one Casey, sleeping off the remnants of a last night's "jag" has no soul for music early in the morning—throws his mattress on them. Their discomfiture is but temporary and they start with renewed vigor a couple of blocks away, where a "lady of color" showers them with ashes; another neighbor throws the contents of a tub on the Germans; a gouty individual "peppers" them with a shotgun; a bartender has the street cleaner drench them with a stream of water; an ever increasing crowd frightens them so much they take to their heels and never stop until they reach the dock; missiles of every description follow them as they jump into the river, where they seek refuge from further persecution.

MANOEUVRES OF THE NEW YORK POLICE FORCE. A marvelous picture, showing over five thousand uniformed New York policemen in a perfect drill, before City officials and the heads of the Police Department.

How well trained a body of men these guardians of the peace really are, can only be appreciated when seen in the action depicted in this film.

This is not a chance picture, taken while on parade, but especially posed for the purpose of demonstrating a detail of the training of this wonderful organization, not generally realized by the public.

SALES COMPANY FILM D'ART.

JEMMY. A Choctaw chief whose attentions are repulsive to Jemmy, a sturdy and pretty frontier woman, determines to take her by force. He awaits a chance when her husband is away and entering with a band of Indians, tears her from her little son, and carries her off. When her husband returns the child tells what occurred and a posse goes out in search of the savages. They meet in a pitched battle, but the Indians secure their captive, and the husband returns home alone.

A year passes. He has given Jemmy up for dead, and now takes unto himself a new helpmate. Matters go along smoothly, and Lily is a good mother to the child. But the captive, thought dead, suddenly returns. Her husband fails to recognize her at first, but when he does he faces an ordeal. Lily, however, is a noble soul, and realizing that she is now in the way, places the child in Jemmy's arms and leaves the home forever.

CENTAUR

SHE WOULD BE A BUSINESS MAN.—Three failures in one morning's mail was more than Mrs. Manly could endure. Taking the telegrams from the hand of her husband she flaunted them in his face and derided him on his lack of business ability, claiming that were she the man she would meet with no failures. He answered her defi with a proposition that for a moment staggered her, but which she accepted in the same spirit as it was given. The proposition from her husband was that as she felt herself so capable a business man that she be the man in the family and he would take her place, even to the exchange of wearing apparel. Dressed as the man she at once proceeded to put into action her methods of business.

Her great difficulty in her man's garb was that when having an interview with a business man, that man seemed to not be able to concentrate his mind on business but wanted to take her out to lunch instead, with the result that she was obliged to order him out of the house, which action necessarily terminated the business deal with him. And so with every man she met in the course of her business, she either met with admiration consternation or ridicule according to the temperament of the man. In the meantime the husband in his female attire was having as difficult a time with the house domestics, canvassers, peddlers, etc., and when his wife came to him meek and humiliated, and asked him to change back again, as she didn't want to be a business man, he threw his arms about her and agreed that the return was as acceptable to him as it was necessary for her.

FOR HER SON'S SAKE.—Daniel Blake, with his mother, lived from early childhood with his wealthy uncle, his mother's brother; and naturally supposed that he was to be the heir in spite of the fact that the old man had a ward who was the daughter of a dead friend. Daniel had been strengthened in the supposition by his mother and when the old man lay dying and made his will, Mrs. Blake was dumfounded and near crazed to find that the money was to be left to charity. Denouncing the old man for his deception and arguing in favor of her son she was ordered from the room. The old man repented the next day and in a spirit of maliciousness wrote a new will but had it in a most unusual place. After his death when the will was read by the lawyer, it turned out to be a forged one, as it was dated three days after the old man's death.

The lawyer at once jumped to the conclusion that the mother had substituted a will for the original, leaving the money to her son. He accuses her and she pleads for her son's sake to let it stand as it is. The lawyer gives her one hour to return the stolen will and he will say nothing about the deception and crime, but if she refuses he will call in the police.

After deliberation, she refuses to give up the original will and defies the lawyer. Her son overhearing the accusation and defiance makes his presence known and in a fit of indignation against her, he denounces his mother, even though, what she did was for his sake.

Severely admonished by the lawyer the boy soon realizes that her sacrifice of honor was for nothing and in a burst of love he forgives her and offers to build a home for her away from the scene of sorrow.

The hidden will is discovered and all ends happily.

THE CROOKED TRAIL. Amelia, Mrs. Howard's daughter by her first marriage was a girl after her mother's own heart. High spirited, extravagant and domineering, and as the neighbors wearily added absolutely heartless, was quite the reverse to her step-sister—gentle, modest little Jean, who so very meekness irritated her step-sister almost to desperation—the more she abused the girl the more Jean tried to please.

But to-day Mrs. Howard's thoughts were all concentrated upon her darling. Amelia had written she was coming home for a short visit and needed friends. the dear girl had such artistic tastes—and although she knew her husband had already [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sea voyage with his vessel. His wife, who has accompanied him many times on various voyages, has to stop at home this time. During her travels she gained a good knowledge of navigation and after the Captain has left, one of her chief pleasures during the Winter evenings is to follow him on his voyage on the chart which she has in her little home. One night after having put the children to bed she has a vivid dream that her husband is wrecked. So impressed is she with this dream that she hires a ship and crew and goes to the place she saw in her dream. She finds her husband on the wreck on a desert island, and is just in time to save him from death.

THE CLOWN AND HIS DOGS.—The celebrated clown, Mr. Zekrto, shows us in this picture what he is capable of doing with his 20 dogs. He has them trained to perfection, and they perform wonderfully well, with a precision that is astonishing. The "stunts" they go through are numerous, and many highly amusing. This film is a vaudeville act in itself.

SAVED FROM HIMSELF.—Tom Atkins brings his college friend home to spend vacation. Tom's cigarette smoking is increased by idleness and causes consternation and sorrow among his friends. Steve, a fine, clean, manly chap, falls in love with Margaret, Tom's sister, who reciprocates his affection and accepts him on condition that he will save Tom from himself. The habit leads Tom into bad company, and whiskey adds its enslaving power to cigarettes. In such company Steve finds Tom, and after a fight drags him home. Tom's condition is serious, a doctor is called in, who announces the dread fact that Tom has consumption. Desperate measures are necessary, for even in the shadow of death Tom persists in smoking excessively. Steve calls in a professional hypnotist, who commands Tom, through the power of suggestion, never to smoke again. His work is successful, for Tom refuses a cigarette while in hypnotic condition. Tom goes away for his health. Two years pass. Steve and Margaret are married and a beautiful child is born. At a family reunion Tom returns, the victory won.

THE RANCHMAN'S SIMPLE SON.—Simon, a poor fool, finds great sport in tormenting the animals about the ranch, and excites much amusement among the inmates. The ranch owner and his son-in-law laughingly follow him to see how he treats a pig and then mount their horses and ride away. They come to a camp in time to hear an argument among the cowboys. One has won by cheating and is being held to account. The ranch owner, when he learns of the facts, loses no time in sending him away. Simon, tired of milking, sticks the cow with a pin, which naturally ends the beast's quiet, so Simon's task is finished. He gets punished for his act and follows Rose, the ranchman's daughter. She rides away in a buckboard and leaves him behind. The cowboy who cheated sees her departure and decides revenge could be gained through her. Simon follows him, carrying a pitchfork; and when Rob overtakes the buckboard and grabs the reins from Rose, he secretes himself in the back. Rob takes his captive to a shack where he imprisons her, but imagine his surprise at being confronted by Simon, who pins him to the shack with his pitchfork. Simon then releases Rose, who goes for her father. When he, with his followers, reaches the shack, Simon is still holding Rob at bay, with his own gun, while the poor fool munches an apple. Rob is set free and taken away, and Rose takes Simon home. Though he is caressed and made much of for saving Rose, he asks only for pie and still holds on to it when the cowboys raise him on their shoulders and carry him off.

HER TERRIBLE PERIL.—Molly and Lawrence are basking in the sunshine and whispering sweet never old phrases of love to each other. They are interrupted by Esther, the jovial, who pours water on Lawrence's head. All three run out to the barnyard where the girls overwhelm their father with hugs. Seeing the horses about suggests a drive to the girls and they jump into the buckboard and ride away. At various places they stop to gather flowers, first one and then the other alighting. Molly sees a pretty blossom growing on the edge of a precipice and stoops to pluck it. She loses her balance and goes over. Esther, horrified, gets down to see where her sister is and finds her hanging on with her hands. Summoning all fortitude to her aid, Esther reaches the buckboard and drives off at a furious pace. Molly is losing strength and to stay in that position for a longer time seems beyond her endurance. Esther reaches the barnyard, tells of Molly's accident, and all follow her to the precipice. They tie their lariats together and the cowboys lower Lawrence. When Molly feels his arms about her she relaxes and faints. The boys continue to lower them to the bottom of the cliff, and then await the arrival of Lawrence with his beloved burden. He soon carries her into their midst. She revives and Lawrence is kissed by Esther and Molly, and heartily thanked by the father, while the cowboys show their appreciation by firing their guns.

A Great Thanhouser Comedy Split-Reel

Gone to Coney Island and Booming Business

Thanhouser Funnyfilm—clean and infectious. Your patrons won't miss these two big laughs if you're a wise exhibitor. Order!

GONE TO CONEY ISLAND! Kate has been employed for a number of years as a maid in the home of Mrs. Greene. Her "young man," Henry, works down at Coney. He induces Kate to leave her place and take a situation as ticket seller at Luna Park. Kate tries to tell her mistress of her intended departure, but Mrs. Greene is busy and refuses to listen. Mrs. Greene goes out and during her absence, Kate takes French leave, leaving a note saying she is going to Coney Island.

Never having visited the Island, Mrs. Greene considers it a dreadful place, and when she gets Kate's note, thinks it her duty to immediately start in pursuit of the misguided girl. Not knowing how to get to the Island, she appeals to her old friend, Prof. Griggs. He also is ignorant of the ways of Coney, but in turn appeals to his friend, Casey, a ward politician, who of course knows the Island, and consents to act as their escort.

The three set out for Coney, and start on their search for Kate. The hunt is almost forgotten in the joys of Looping the Loop, Shooting the Chutes and the various other diversions of the Island.

When they finally find Kate, she is at her post, selling tickets at Luna. She laughs at Mrs. Greene's fears for her safety, announces the fact that she is happily married, and presents the lucky man. In a cool Coney corner, Mrs. Greene confesses that she found Coney wasn't as bad as it was painted, and that she is going to revisit it often.

BOOMING BUSINESS.—Jack is an industrious young business man, who has invested in a small stock of stationery, and set up shop. He unfortunately has no customers, and his various schemes to bring trade prove extremely unlucky but mighty laughable. What they are we'd better let the little picture tell.

Approximate Length 1,000 Feet. No. 122. Code Word, Coney

Scene from "GONE TO CONEY ISLAND."

Released Friday, July 8th

The Girl Strike Leader

A GREAT THANHOUSER UPLIFT FILM

Dealing with that momentous National problem—the labor question. Your patrons will like this solution. Please them!

Scene from "THE GIRL STRIKE LEADER."

Hal Stephens, a wealthy young man, devotes all his time to enjoying himself, and thereby earns the disapproval of his staid old father. The elder Stephens sees the young man start off on an auto trip with some gay friends, and decides to call a halt.

He notifies his son by telegram that it is time he went to work, and presents him with a factory. This arouses the merriment of his friends, but Hal declares that he will buckle down and go to work. He tells his father, however, that he desires to start incog., and the father consents.

Hal enters the factory and goes to work as an ordinary laborer, his identity being unknown to all. He meets Lou, a young working girl, and falls in love with her. The manager of the place, one Conners, tries to make love to Lou, and Hal protects her. There is an order put up reducing salaries ten per cent., and Lou induces the others to strike rather than to submit.

The strikers, starved out, finally return to work, with the exception of Lou, who is defiant to the end. Hal finds her weeping on the steps of her home and tells her of his love. She agrees to marry him.

After she has accepted him, he leads her to the factory, announces his identity, assumes possession, and restores wages to the old scale, after having discharged the rogue Conners.

Approximate Length 1,000 Feet. No. 123. Code Word, Strike

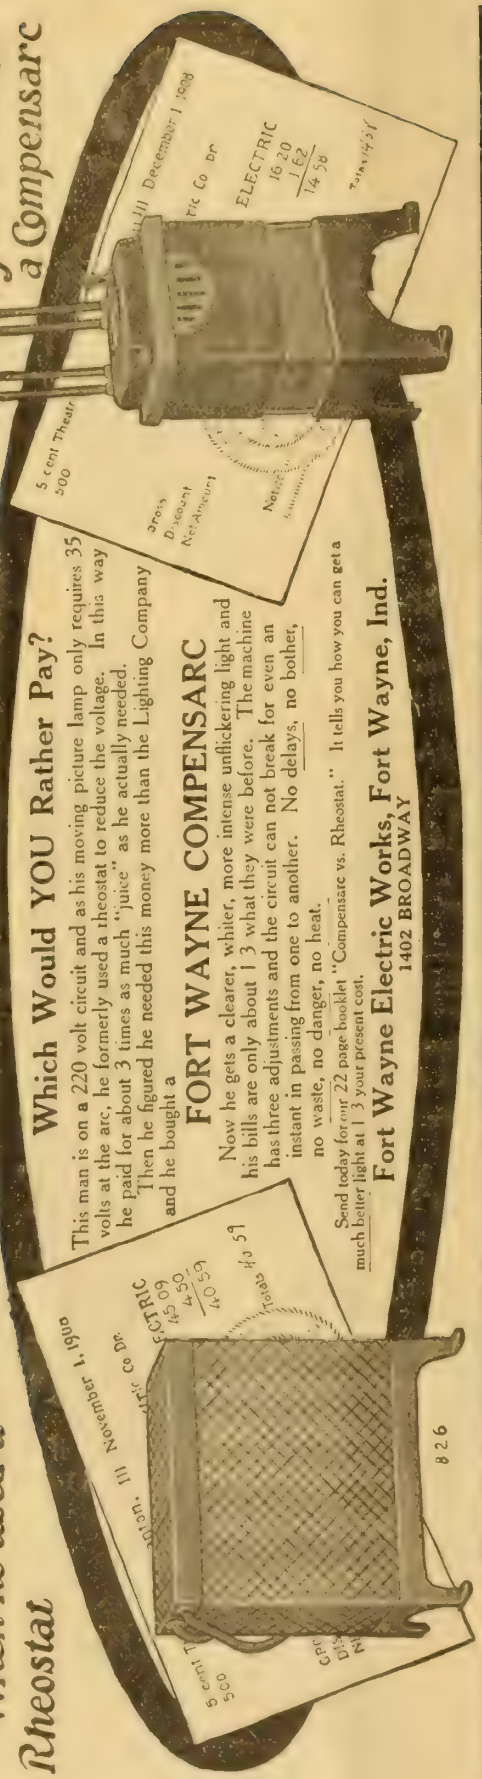
After he bought a Compensarc



Which Would YOU Rather Pay?
This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.
Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a
FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC
Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.
Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1/3 your present cost.

NOTHING CAN STOP THESE "IMPS"

The "Imp" release for Monday, July 11th, is going to make as tremendous a hit as our famous "Fruit and Flowers" picture did. Begin to ask for it right now. It is entitled:

"Old Heads and Young Hearts"

A snappy, dainty comedy in which two old duffers want their son and daughter to wed, but disgust them with their eagerness. Finally the fathers pretend to fight and object to the wedding. And their ruse works of course. If you don't laugh when you see this play, you've got a heart that would make a cowhide look like pulp. Demand it. Begin NOW.

"The Saloon Next Door"

is the name of our Thursday, July 14th release. It is a typical "Imp" drama, the kind that has always packed your house, the kind you will ask your exchange to send back for a return date. If your exchange can't give you Imp films, it probably isn't buying any kind of films at all. If that is the case, switch, brother, swiich!

Dress and the Picture.

As time goes on the number of analogies between the talking play and the silent play increases or rather becomes more apparent. Everyone is aware that in the ordinary talking play, whether it be a comedy, a drama, a tragedy, or a musical piece, dress plays an important part. And by dress we mean this: That very often the play mirrors the fashion amongst women, or practically leads to a suggestion of the fashion. In New York, perhaps, the importance of dress in the talking play is not so well recognized as in London or Paris. In London or Paris, when a new attraction having innumerable stars is put on the stage, the papers on the morning after the premiere are filled with columns descriptive of the gowns and other confections worn by the actresses.

It is an undoubted fact that innumerable women go to the theater in London or Paris to study the latest modes and styles. Do they do this in New York? Probably, although the newspapers do not make so much of the matter as they do across the Atlantic. We are led into these reflections by studying some enlarged pictures of recent releases which have made a very agreeable impression on our mind in virtue of the fact that special pains seem to have been taken by the producers to dress the characters in conformity with the height of modern fashion. There is in the first case, the Essanay "Hollow Cane" in which a lady is exhibiting some curios to her guests. This picture looks to us perfectly dressed. First of all, the appointments of the room are complete and then the men characters are faultless dressed in evening attire, while as to the ladies: we submitted the picture to an expert feminine criticism and were assured that the women were just as well turned out as if they were taking part in a real society function on Fifth avenue. We have recently noted other pictures by other manufacturers which exhibited this commendable quality of being well dressed. But the particular one that we are referring to now, besides being the more recent, will illustrate our point as well as any other, or many others.

We have pointed out over and over again in these pages that a very large part of the constituency of the moving picture theater are women and children—especially women—and that anything which tends to please and interest the fairer half of humanity will retain their patronage. One of the sights of New York City is, of course, a walk along West Twenty-third street, or West Thirty-fourth street, any Spring day when the enormous crowds of femininity studying women's costumes in the store windows tells mere man what an amazing importance is attached by the fair sex to this question of dress.

Now, we have little doubt that with the march of progress that is going on in the moving picture, this question of the up-to-date dress of the feminine characters will be found of vital importance by the producers. Women will go to see those dresses as well as to see the play. We do not want to see any play overdressed; we do not want to see any story subordinated in its development to the art of the milliner, but at the same time we feel that the proper and refined dressing of the moving picture is calculated to contribute materially to its success. Then, again, there is another aspect of this question of dress which appeals to us, and it is this: A fine comedy like the Essanay "Hollow Cane," refinedly dressed, appeals to refined people. We want to see refined people in the moving picture theater, not by way of exception, but by way of a general rule. Such work as that of the Essanay Company is bringing about this very desirable state of things.

Perhaps, while we are on the subject, we might include in our favorable criticism of the sartorial aspect of the moving picture, an Edison picture, "Out of the Night." Here again in the charming comedy scenes you have groups of perfectly dressed men and women; men and women who can wear their fine clothes with distinction, and who do not look out of place in them and who do not feel strange in them. Again we say that this is what we want to see in a moving picture theater.

Carlyle in "Sartor Resartus" deals with the philosophy of clothes. He called us all "forked radishes" and says some other amazing things at the expense of poor frail humanity which seeks to dress well. We are not all Carlyles, and we are certainly not all philosophers, but as Lincoln said, "Just plain people." And as plain people we realize that dress, fitting dress, plays a vital part in the battle of life. We, who write this, know what it is by force of circumstances to be both well and ill-dressed. Frankly, we do not like the latter. The better dressed the individual is, the better for him and the better for the remainder of the world. The better dressed the moving picture is, the more it will increase in popularity amongst its vast public. We may yet live to see the time when fashionable women will go to the moving picture theater to study the latest modes. Who knows?

The Talkfest.

There is a story told of one of a large number of parrots who was suddenly endowed with the gift of speech. Looking round, in the quaint way of his cogeners, he chuckled: "My God! What a lot of parrots." There are other parrot stories, all more or less bearing upon the curiosities of speech. There is the story of the parrot, which was recently told at an F. S. A. festivity, who, after having been almost killed by a dog, discovered that he had talked a darn sight too much. The moral, of course, is that speech should be husbanded like any of the other natural resources with which our common humanity is endowed.

"What a lot of parrots!" one might feel inclined to say if we looked back at the moving picture situation in this country during the last three years. But it is not necessary to traverse the whole of the ground. Let us go back to January, 1909, and contemplate the history of Independence since that fateful month. The marvel is that any Independent business has been done at all considering the amount of talk that has taken place. There seems to be nothing but talk with many of the leading lights of the Independent field. Are they to be commiserated? Is it their fault—their misfortune? What is it, we wonder? What is there about this curious little picture, which is the basis of a great industry, that it provokes so much talk in its exploitation? Is it the same in other businesses or professions? Is there as much talkee talkee, say, in the provision trade, as in the moving picture industry? We trow not, but we know not.

We all talk. We like the exchange and interchange of ideas, we like the attrition of mind upon mind, because it is by that means, and that means only, that one really learns by or from one's fellow man. But you can have too much of a good thing, and there has, we fear, been too much talkee talkee in the Independent field these last fourteen months. Too much talk; too little action. The danger of this unmasterly activity is only perceived by sympathetic onlookers like ourselves, who see grave risks to the business from the waste of time that goes on in one important section of it, namely, the Independent field. Speech is silver, but silence is golden.

We hope and believe that these talkfests have ended, or rather have ceased to be abnormal in number and length. Many of them, we can see with half an eye, have been prompted by interested parties, anxious to keep themselves in the limelight, to advertise themselves, and to enjoy a brief authority or prominence. Not all of these gatherings, alliances, associations are really sincere. Vanity plays a large part in human nature, and the number of men who are fond of the sound of their own voices in public is phenomenal. Here you have the secret of these lengthy, long-drawn-out film talkfests. American people are naturally loquacious, especially in their own country. In Europe they are notable for their talkativeness on the smallest provocation. It is only your inhabitant of the effete old worlds of Europe, Asia and Africa that has cultivated the gentle art of taciturnity—that is, of saying nothing, of saying it first, last and all the time, and yet in reality of saying just as much as the most loquacious member of any moving picture organization.

Some time this month there is to be a talkfest at Detroit, namely, the meeting of the Film Service Association. We are full of conjecture as to what will be talked then and what will result from the talk, inasmuch as since the January meeting the officiate of the Film Service Association has undergone great changes and the membership has suffered some diminution. We understand the meeting is to be held, but at the present time it looks as though it will be shorn of so much of its interest that it will not be so talkative a fest as was anticipated.

The Dove of Peace.

THE INDEPENDENT SITUATION CLARIFIED.

In our experience of many industries, extending over a score of years, the situation in the Independent moving picture field of America, which has lasted from January, 1909, to June, 1910—that is, approximately eighteen months—has been without parallel. To use a homely simile: The Independents have been wandering in the wilderness without a leader. Various claimants who have been out for the position of Moses or Napoleon have not made good their titles to those dignities. Again, the Independents may fairly be compared to a ship without a rudder, tossed in the sea at the mercy of wind and wave. Then, again, they are like the lost sheep on a mountain with no shepherd to call them together. It was inevitable that when the Motion Picture Patents Company was formed and took control of the larger slice of the business that the minority side, or Independents, would find some difficulty in getting together for the purpose of keeping up their end of the stick. So it has proved. It would not be worth while to take up the space of this paper to review the various abortive attempts or alleged attempts to line up the Independent situation as between renters, manufacturers, importers and exhibitors. If we did so, we should have to handle some reputations very drastically, and hand out some criticisms quite as emphatic as those that were printed last week under the caption "A Liar and His Lies." Let the dead past bury its dead.

Between the Sales Company and the Associated Independent Manufacturers there has, for some time, been visible to us a desire to compromise, which we have done our best to encourage. The last number of this paper had hardly gone into circulation before that dove of peace to which we referred a few weeks ago once more became visible. It paid a surprise visit to Fourteenth street, another one to Twenty-fifth street, and the outcome of its kindly offices was that both sides have got together and the war between the two sections of the Independent moving picture field has ended. The hatchet has been buried; Charles Baumann and George Magie have metaphorically smoked the pipe of peace, and, putting all joking on one side, there seems at last, after these eighteen months, some distinct hope that the Independent side of the moving picture industry of the United States will at last be put on a clear business basis.

What has happened in the last few days to make this reconciliation feasible? Simply that the Sales Company is to be re-incorporated under a new charter. It will have a board of directors consisting of twelve men—six representing the Sales Company's interests and six representing those of the Associated Independent Manufacturers. That $100 per capita tribute for office expenses will be abolished. Each manufacturer or importer will pay so much a release into the common fund for administrative purposes. Each manufacturer will ship his goods through the Sales Company, but he will have the option of getting payment therefor direct. A secretary will be elected to conduct the routine business of this Film Clearing House, for such it is, and offices will be in neutral territory. The new body then presents all the aspects of an equitable co-operative scheme for the distribution of Independent film.

One effect of this amalgamation will rapidly make itself felt. Your Independent exchange, and therefore your Independent theater, is now assured of a full service of Independent pictures. There are twenty-one or more reels available per week, and a glance at the releases will show that the Independent moving picture side of the industry in this country is now in command of as variegated an assortment of programmes as it could possibly desire, qualitatively comparing well with the general average of licensed pictures. All this, no doubt, will be good news for the fifty or more exchanges which are buying Independent pictures. So far, so good. Time after time we have said that in so far as the Sales Company existed for the general good, it would have the encouragement and support of this journal. It seems to us, after carefully listening to the new scheme of policy which the reformed and reorganized Sales Company has adopted, that it deserves our support, and that it deserves to succeed. In that case we have little to say, except that we hope the company will go right ahead and prosper, that harmony will prevail, that at last the Independent renter will have a chance at his end of the business and that the Independent exhibitor will now be in a position to show the public that the manufacturing and importing of Independent pictures is no more a dream, but has a solid substratum of business acumen, good quality of picture and certainty of supply.

How does the Alliance stand in this adjustment of matters? The Alliance, it seems to us, has a chance of standing better than ever, for at last something like a definite programme seems to have been marked out for it. It is to look after the interests of the renter as between manufacturer and exhibitor. Already there are signs that the Independent renters feel confidence in the new condition of things. Many of them were present in New York last week when the negotiations between the Sales Company and the Associated Manufacturers were in progress, and they materially contributed to the success of those negotiations.

R. G. Bachman, the Alliance president, although a sick man, came to New York prepared to stay until a compromise was reached. Other exchange men who gave their time and efforts were Messrs. Plough, of Chicago; Greene and Gorman, of Boston; Morgan, of Kansas City, and Davis, of Pittsburg.

So far as we can learn very little discord has made itself manifest in the consummation of the negotiations which have led to the fusion of the conflicting Independent interests. We are confident that any little difficulties of detail that may arise may be smoothed away by the good sense of the level-headed business men on both sides of the field and we congratulate them on having got together and ended an intolerable and an impossible position. Really, there is very little more for us to say now, except to reiterate our satisfaction at the fact of the Sales Company and the Associated Manufacturers having successfully got together for their mutual advantage. We shall be happy if this internecine strife has finally ended, so that we can get down to the routine business of our end of matters, which is to promote the best interests of the picture trade before the public, spread a knowledge of what good moving picture photography is, and generally to promote the best interests of the industry. Frankly, we have quite enough to do in this regard to devote any further time to political matters, and we hope that we shall not be called upon to do so again. Gentlemen, we extend to you our blessing! May you prosper in the business that both you and we are sincerely desirous of augmenting and extending.

What I Know and Have Seen.

By Charles N. Sims.

That the motion picture is doing things, things worth while, in educating the masses along literary and historical lines, is an established fact, which any one can settle to his own personal satisfaction, if he will but take the time and trouble to visit a motion picture theater with that object in view.

In country towns of from 2,500 to 5,000 inhabitants, where people are well acquainted with their neighbors, the good work that has been done by the motion picture is more apparent than in the larger cities, although the result is universally the same.

One case, especially, that came under my personal notice was that of a day laborer, who, though able to read and write quite well, had never heard of the immortal Shakespeare until he chanced to see one of the several splendidly done Shakespearean productions in a five-cent motion picture show. That laborer walked several blocks out of his way every evening on his road home from work, so as to pass a moving picture bill board, with the hope of finding a Shakespearean play billed. This man not only sees every "heavy" film that is shown in his town, but has procured a library card—the first that he has ever owned—and is now reading the plays for himself. This is but a single instance.

The exhibitor who raised his voice a short time ago to caution the manufacturers to go slow in the production of the classic films, obscure historical events, and so forth, is not only making a public announcement of his ignorance of human nature, but is unfair to his patrons. No difference whether his theater is located on a crowded thoroughfare of a great city, or in the heart of a sparsely settled farming district.

Everywhere people are the same—the same at least in wanting good things. One exhibitor was supposed to have said of a certain film, "The acting was superb, and the photography a work of art, yet the play itself was so far above the comprehension of the audience that they found themselves wondering what the deuce it was all about, anyhow." Sounds paradoxical, does it not? Well, it is not; while we all have often heard of a play so bad that it was good, whoever has heard of a play so good that it was bad.

The motion picture, as I view it, has done something more than make money for the manufacturer; it has helped a lot of people in a lot of ways, as you all shall see.

CONCERNING SCENARIOS.

By Emar.

What is the first requisite in the manufacture of moving picture film? No one, understanding, will gainsay the assertion that it is the scenario.

Who, filling a dominant requirement, is held in such complete obscurity as the writer of the scenario? Why?

The name of the author of every novel, or other form of story, or every play or playlet, poem or song, is given more or less prominence under the title of his work. The money paid for the scenario is all the writer receives. He is not given the same chance to derive a further profit from his work that is unreservedly granted in other branches of literary work.

The custom of ignoring the writer of the film story was established when the moving picture industry was in its infancy; when almost any kind of story was considered good enough to make a film. Less years ago than could be counted on a thumbless hand, a certain man engaged in the manufacture of films. Talking over what he proposed to do he referred to everything except scenarios. He did not know the meaning of the word "scenario." "O, the stories," he exclaimed contemptuously. "I can get thousands of them for a mere song." He was right. One advertisement brought him nearly two hundred. Three more insertions brought him five hundred. He discovered that most of the writers were willing to take whatever was offered. He was a shrewd man. There were rumors of others entering this El Dorado. He was determined to stock up on stories while they were cheap; before competition would raise the price. He bought every script he could get at his own valuation. When he "hired" a producer he was told that the "bargains" he had gathered were of no use. The few scripts that had any merit whatever as stories lacked the essentials for dramatization.

In one respect that market was a great boon. Many amateur scribblers got back the money they had paid for postage on stuff rejected by publishers.

When some of the managers began to realize that the game had passed the stage when a few guffaws might be taken to constitute the verdict of the public that a comedy is a success, and a few sniffles were evidence enough to declare a drama to have made a hit; when it dawned on some of the film makers that a permanent patronage of intelligent people had to be considered to keep alive the goose that lays such a profusion of golden eggs, then the scenario writer was accorded a measure of importance.

A few weeks ago two writers of fair reputation were sitting in a certain club room where they frequently met for lunch. A very debonnaire individual approached, effusively greeting one with whom he was acquainted. Assuming the air of a benefactor, the newcomer talked of "easy money." "All we want," he said, "is the bare outline of the story laid out in scenes. Six hundred words is enough. A hundred dollars is the price I am authorized to offer."

The debonnaire individual appeared to be greatly surprised that neither one of the pair grasped his hands, too much moved to utter thanks. They merely looked at each other and grinned.

A scenario that will make a full reel will also make a magazine story of eight to ten thousand words for which a writer of any standing whatever will receive at least five cents a word. If the story is good enough to be thus rated it stands a good chance of being noted by other editors: to bring requests for contributions. If the story happens to make a favorable impression on the manager of a dramatic company, or star, and is dramatized, it may bring a little fortune in royalties. That, mainly, is why only three scripts out of more than two thousand were found "available" by one of the leading moving picture manufacturers, according to his own statement published recently.

The writing of a scenario is a distinct profession.

Whatever success may be achieved with productions on the screen, other than for entertainment, it will be conceded that with the entertainment branch rests the problem: "Will the moving picture industry expand further and indefinitely, or will it come to a halt and dwindle out?" Obviously the mainstays of this business are its entertainment features, the drama and the comedy. According to the quality of these manufacturing concerns take rank and profit.

The writer of scenarios cannot expect as large compensation as one who writes for the "regular" stage, because his production is limited to a comparatively short life. However good, in all respects, the money earned by a film is taken in a few months, whereas the "regular" play may remain in service many years. This fact being well understood, also deters many from considering this new branch of literature.

A ridiculous condition of the moving picture business enters here. Every day many persons speak of certain films they would be pleased to see again; would go far to see again; would give much more than the usual price of admission to see again. In line with that observation the gist of a recent occurrence may be read with profit. Passing a new house the writer saw the announcement of a picture that was not among releases listed in six months. Curiosity prompted an investigation. Most of the alleged "Film d'Art" of recent date were outclassed by this exhibit. The strong impression it made on a good audience was unmistakable. The manager (?) being asked "What is the release date of that film?"—snorted—"It ain's got any. It's old junk! If that d—d exchange sends me another back number like that I'll quit 'em." His judgment, like that of many others in his class, was based entirely on release dates. That film was a veritable masterpiece and wonderfully well preserved. Passing out with the crowd, the question—"How was that for a picture?" was addressed to whoever would answer. One man, hurrying away, said: "I am going for my folks. I would not have them miss it for anything." Others expressed their admiration with enthusiasm.

Another experience is worth noting here. A picture was exhibited where the projection is always well done. It was an excellent film but the story it was meant to tell was absolutely unintelligible. No one knew what it was about. If sub-titles and notes had been judiciously used the picture would have made a decided hit. As it was the audience gave unmistakable signs of irritation and more than a few remarks were heard to the effect that "One has to do too much hard guessing to get any sense out of some of these pictures." A few days later a manufacturer asked me to see a new reel put on the screen. An exchange man was of the party. It was a good story made very clear by several scripts and two printed reports. When the run of this film was finished the customer exploded as follows: "Say! There must be nearly a hundred feet of writing and printing on that reel! Do you expect me to pay for that?" The explanatory notes, cleverly introduced, made that film one of the most satisfactory exhibits seen in a long time.

WHAT PEOPLE WANT.

SOME OBSERVATIONS, BY H. F. HOFFMAN.

It was the scenic picture that gave cinematography its start. At the beginning all intelligent people turned their eyes to the new wonder of the animated photograph and were not at all ashamed of being considered enthusiasts. There were none other than scenic views to be seen in the early days and probably it was for that reason that the upper classes did not hold aloof as they do now. The pictures were a feature at Keith's Union Square Theater for nearly a year, drawing the attention of society people, professional people of all branches, interesting the financier, the merchant and all others of the most desirable class, until one day somebody thought of the punk melodrama.

From that day the interest in moving pictures was divided. The thinking class of men and women began to see less and less of the sensible scenic picture. They soon woke up to the fact that they were having 10-20-30 melodrama stuffed down their throats and quietly withdrew. Polite people, as you know, are the last to clamor or make demands. Instead of that, when they see the rabble coming into their favorite eating place, or library, or club, or church, or district, or theater, they make no outcry, but like the Arab they fold their tents and silently steal away.

Thus it was with moving pictures. The lower class who always "speak their mouth out" were listened to by the manager and the manufacturer. When they heard the newsboy kiss the villain and the shop girl applaud the golden haired hero, they said to each other, "Good, this is what the people want; we shall give them plenty!" and they certainly did. The better element when they heard the teamster whistle through his teeth in approbation of the thrilling escape from Sing Sing, looked at one another with elevated eyebrows, lifted their skirts and passed outside to return no more. They made no fuss with the manager; the fact that they had come there was proof enough that they liked moving pictures, but with this deliberate pandering to the gallery gods they felt that they were out of their class and were also wasting their time looking at pure rot.

It is not difficult to explain how this all came about. At the outset of moving pictures certain men were quick to get in on the "ground floor." Some of them saw at a glance the future of it all, some of them got in by accident and others were kicked into it. A few of them were men of theatrical experience but the majority were totally inexperienced. They flourished, one and all. They began to make pictures and the pictures reflected themselves. In other words, we soon had men who were mere novices catering to the intelligence of an amusement loving public. The educated class quickly saw that instead of brains catering to brains it was a case of class catering to class, and that let them out.

The business flourished and became a fevered craze, as we know, but the fever has cooled down, and what is better, those incompetents of the early days have passed into the oblivion they so richly deserved. The great pity of it all is that the excellent experienced producers who to-day are turning out such beautiful work were not in the game at a time when they were so sorely needed. Had this been the case the moving picture would never have "ran amuck;" the snow white screen would never have been tainted with the stain of obscenity and filthy lucre. But now that the drift is upward instead of downward it behooves us all who have fought the good fight to make one last stand for the right, for the battle is nearly won.

While the picture trade was at its height; while the press and clergy were bitterly assailing it and the masses were fighting to get their nickels and dimes in the cash window to see the hero save the girl and thwart the villain, I used to spend my Sundays at other picture houses to get a line on what was coming out for the benefit of my own patrons. On one of those Sundays I went to hear Burton Holmes at Carnegie Hall. I had a seat away up under the roof and it cost me a dollar. Downstairs it was $2 and $2.50, but one dollar was all I cared to go on a picture show. The house was jammed with fashionable people and I remarked to my companion, "Did you ever see such a swell bunch at a picture show?" Mr. Holmes' entertainment consisted almost entirely of scenic pictures with one or two Pathe comedies by way of variety, but nix on the melodrama. The audience was immensely pleased, but what made me gasp was that some of the scenes he showed them for $2 had been seen at my theater for five cents over a year before.

On another Sunday I went to hear Mr. R. G. Knowles at Daly's Theater. There was another houseful of fashionable people giving up from 75 cents to $1.50 to look at the despised scenic, both stationary and animated. Melodrama was absent and not missed or thought of. Another Sunday I handed up $1 to Mr. Lyman Howe at the Hippodrome. No lecture went with the entertainment; merely scenics, industrials and pictures of bird and animal life with a few comedies as a relief or variety. These pictures without lecture or music held that large audience for over two hours with undivided attention and without melodrama. Here again I saw for $1 pictures that I had exhibited for a nickel more than a year before. One of them in particular, I remember, "The Wonders of Canada," was the most talked-of picture I have ever exhibited, and a scenic at that.

I went away from these exhibitions feeling like a "piker." To see other men getting $1.50 and $2 for exhibiting old scenics made me feel like a baby at the game. The following Monday mornings at the exchange I would make loud demands for scenics but each time I received the same reply, which was, "very sorry; we would like to give them to you but there is no demand for them and therefore it would not pay us to buy them. All the exhibitors ask for comedy and melodrama and refuse to take the scenics, so what can we do if the public does not want them?" The public doesn't want them; sad isn't it? Carnegie Hall packed from pit to dome at $1 to $2.50 and yet the public doesn't want them! Daly's Theatre crowded, prices 75 cents to $1.50 and the public doesn't want them! The Hippodrome filled from 50c to $1.50 and still the public doesn't want them!

Another illustration in favor of the scenic or industrial picture; when the pictures finally penetrated to the remotest hamlets and every town of 2,000 inhabitants had its picture theatre, it practically wiped out the traveling picture show for the reason that every town was supplied and was getting the same thing for only 5c what the traveler asked 25c or more for. Only the other day I happened to be in Hackensack, N. J., and there I saw the town heavily billed by a well known lecturer for an entertainment to be given at the local theater and to consist entirely of scenic and industrial pictures. Large three-sheets giving the entire program were all about. Now where is an experienced exhibitor to-day who would dare to go into Hackensack or any other town with a mixed program of comedy and drama and expect to make any money, especially with one or two regular local houses running the same thing every day? You can do it with the other kind.

but I am firm in my belief that we get too much of it in proportion to comedy and straight stuff. People don t come into our places because they want to cry; they have troubles of their own. Perhaps the reason we get so much profitless melodrama is because it is the easiest thing in the world to write. The writing of comedies shows a man up in an instant to be either an idiot or a clever craftsman. It requires an idea, a sense of humor, an artistic touch, experience and much originality. But with melodrama, perhaps it is unnecessary to tell you, you can start anywhere and finish anywhere.

Begin, for instance, by beating the child; then have the older daughter interfere only to be stabbed by the cruel father who in turn is stabbed by the bard-working son who enters from the field with two milk pails, just in time to catch their blood. Then, if things are not sufficiently sad, you can have the old lady die of grief while the H. W. S. is led off to prison on the accusation of his rival in love. Let the beaten child wander forth with the unhappy sweetheart, and have them both starved and cuffed and kicked by all whom they meet, while singing by the wayside for alms. Meantime the h. w. s. can be made to invent some wonderful machine in prison that makes him wealthy. You can then have him pardoned and find the little brother and sweetheart only to learn that she had gone blind and the child was just drowned while saving her life. Let her then refuse to marry him because she is blind and he is wealthy, she wandering off as he commits suicide and falls across the body of the child. Later on you can have her identify him at the morgue by the pathetic touch of her fingers, while the audience softly weeps, etc., etc.

From what I have been writing I do not want to give the idea that scenic and industrial pictures are the only kinds you ought to exhibit and that the drama should be left out entirely. I do think, however, that at least one straight picture should be in every day's program. The thing should be balanced properly, giving a little more of comedy than any other one kind. There is not enough comedy in the market for the reason that it requires thought, and some men do not like to think. A reasonable dramatic pictlre is liked by all, but when drama outweighs everything else on the bill it shows poor judgment. The fault is not so much with the exhibitor as with the manufacturer who usually turns out two more or less unprofitable dramas to one comedy and very rarely an educational.

There are all kinds of tastes in this world and I realize that you cannot please everybody all the time, but this much is true; there are thousands and thousands of sensible business men and their wives who like nothing better than a fine scenic or interesting industrial. This desirable class is being neglected and it behooves the powers that be to change their one sided catering to the other class and include the sensible business man and his wife. If you do not, Mr. Burton Holmes, Mr. R. G. Knowles, Mr. Lyman Howe and the other fellow will still continue to take in dollars to your dimes by giving the people what they want.

Bloomfield, Ia.—The Idle Hour celebrated its first anniversary last Saturday night and was patronized by three packed houses and would have been compelled to run the fourth and fifth shows had the night been fair. The place has been remodeled on the interior, its seating capacity increased, new electric lights added, an orchestra pit built and newly painted and papered throughout. Mr. J. Howard Newell, the manager, has just put in a new Power's Cameragraph machine. Johnson's orchestra assisted in the music of the evening. Mrs. Newell delighted the audiences with two solos. Mr. Newell is a hustler and will leave nothing undone for the comfort and entertainment of his patrons.

Life on a Ranch.

A Selig Chef d'oeuvre.

I have to thank my friend Selig for making me profoundly dissatisfied with my lot in life. In recent years I have conceived a strong affection for the tents of men; that is to say, I like great cities; I like the life of them; I like the people in them; I like the movement in them. Charles Lamb, the gentle English poet, sang of the delights of the "sweet security of streets." Like me, I suppose, Elia had, for the time being at any rate, tired of country life.

I tired of country life three or four years ago, and that is one of the reasons why I am living in the crudest, noisiest, most cosmopolitan, uncomfortable, go-as-you-please, but wholly delightful city of New York. To me there are features in this city; there are beauties; there are pleasures, that I would not swap for anything of the old world, that I would not exchange for anything that the country could offer. You see, brethern, I am becoming a confirmed Gothamite. But now comes Mr. Selig to, I hope only temporarily, make me discontented with my lot and yearn for the wild, wild ranch of the far, far Southwest. Before now I have babbled of green fields and have yearned to sit on rocks and muse by flood and fell. But that part of my country life has gone now, and it is the lure of the ranch that is on me. I was giving a description of the Selig picture, "Ranch Lief in the Great Southwest," to a small boy of ten, and the lad's eyes glittered with delight. He said, "That is what we boys like to see." Exactly; and it is what we boys of an older and larger growth also like to see.

The Selig "Ranch Life" is racy of the soil, that is to say, it is no make up picture, but an actual transcript of the life it portrays. What marvelous horsemen these ranchmen are! What wonderful skill they have in lassoing refractory cattle; how fascinating to watch the beast brought down and be dragged in the train of the triumphant horseman; to see him handled by a group of brawny ranchmen and branded with a hot iron! You can almost hear the poor beast's flesh sizzle! But up he gets and runs away only to be eaten another day.

What marvelous escapes these great horsemen have! They fall off a horse with all the sang froid, reader, that you and I display when rising from a chair. Injuries and accidents are rare, and seldom does anyone of them get more than a broken finger, a sprained wrist, or a dislocated arm or leg. When they do, they soon get over it.

Then the bucking of the gentle broncho! His submission at the hands and thews of these breezy children of the plains! Then their marvelous exhibition on wild bulls; the fight between man and bull, in which man triumphs. Why, it is more natural, more sportsmanlike, more exhilarating than any Spanish bull fight. It is the real thing. Man shows his mastery over the brutes—mastery that was Divinely assigned to him thousands of years ago.

Oh! the spaciousness of this great picture. The limitless plains, the wild scurry of the horses, the freedom of these untrammeled ranches, the trickiness, the vagaries and, with it all, the intense humanness of the animal side of ranch life! All this is shown in this wonderful film. You have only to see the film to wish you were on the scene, to wish, as I wished, that I could exchange the reach-me-downs of Broadway, New York City, the surface car of conventionality or even Mr. Belmont's subway, for the ranchman's togs, the ranchman's horses, the ranchman's life, his health, his freedom from "civilization," his life in the open air and his intimacy with nature, which is, after all, the proper way of living.

But in default of attaining all this, I will content myself with giving away to a little sincere envy. Meanwhile, let every exhibiting reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD secure this film. It will delight his patrons. There are some champion ropers and broncho busters doing their work in the picture, which represents a phase of life that is passing away before more scientific methods of cattle raising. So the picture will be of interest on historical grounds.

I might here reiterate the personal hope expressed in another part of a recent issue of THE WORLD, that steps may be taken to secure the preservation of such negatives as this. In time to come, our descendants will be looking back on the past just as we are now writing about the past, and picturing the past. Such pictures as the splendid Selig ranch subject will enable them to do the work accurately. T. B.

"ST. PAUL AND THE CENTURION."

A Critical Review by Rev. H. F. Jackson.

Visiting Keith's Bijou Dream to review for the Moving Picture World this Biblical subject in living picture work; with the further desire of knowing how so brief an incident in the life of St. Paul to which the title pointed could be made into a subject of any length; I was certainly surprised that the only relationship between the picture and the subject lay in the title itself; as, beyond the fact that St. Paul and the Centurion are Bible characters, there was nothing else either scriptural or taken from the sacred writings. "St. Paul and the Centurion" is a religious drama showing St. Paul surrounded by a small band of Christians. The Centurion is a man of some pomp in addition to his position of authority, having among his soldiers one of the Christian converts who is severely flogged for neglecting his duties, probably because of his attendance upon the mountain-side meetings held by St. Paul.

The Centurion's daughter, who becomes enamored of the soldier, sympathizing with him because of the cruel treatment he receives, helps him to the Christian meeting place and herself becomes converted, is baptized by St. Paul, who also marries her to the soldier. At this time the Centurion receives a command from the Emperor Nero to slay the Christians. Taking a company of soldiers, he proceeds to their meeting-place and is received without any show of fear by the little band, who under St. Paul continue in prayer. The Centurion vigorously assails St. Paul in Nero's name and is about to seize him when suddenly intercepted by his own daughter and her soldier husband. In dismay he listens to their appeal, "hears the Divine voice," and is converted. He then ruthlessly tears in pieces Nero's written command and with his band of followers kneels in prayer .

I am bound to say the whole subject, while not actually based upon scripture, is clean, the setting is good and the characters well sustained. The reverential appearance and dignity of St. Paul are very worthy.

The one weak part of the play is the seemingly unnecessary marriage of the Centurion's daughter to the soldier of St. Paul; the baptism may be pardoned, although St. Paul did not generally baptize, yet he certainly did not conduct a marriage ceremony; neither would he, I fear, under such circumstances.

This marriage incident becomes the central idea rather than the conversion of the Centurion, which is supposed to be the main purpose of the scene. Candidly, a criticism might be strained, yet a commendation must be guarded. This is one of those subjects which, being clean in itself, must not be tainted by unclean surroundings, and because of its religious origin and nature must be protected from associations which would profane it and make an otherwise good and serious subject sacrilegious.

Unfortunately this profanation is exactly what happened in this particular presentation; St. Paul and the Centurion should have been followed by a clean set of pictures even if of a secular nature. Instead of this it was followed by a vaudeville subject, "Iva Donette and Her Dog," a colored woman in song and jig dance, with a scattering of "witty" sallies the pith of which lay in their pointed jestings. The performing dog was taught to pray while its mistress made laugh-provoking references to the needs of those in the audience to benefit by the dog's prayers. This subject may be acceptable in vaudeville, but following the picture of St. Paul it entirely spoiled its good effects. It would seem impossible to imagine a more sudden change from the sublime to the ridiculous, from the sacred to the profane, nay to the sacrilegious. While this may be entirely unintentional, even accidental, it shows a lack of thought which amounts to not only a carelessness but a lack of respect to that which is best. "St. Paul and the Centurion" was robbed of any good it possessed by being placed in immediate bad company; it seemed as though any good impression it made must be immediately annulled by the presentation of such a detracting subject that the beholder must necessarily place himself under a mental strain as to which portion of the exhibition he should carry in mind. There can be no doubt that such a mixture as that here described is bad; it certainly is not necessary to create such a discord of feeling in anyone's mind by jumping from one extreme to another

THE EDENGRAPH.

If you want to be thoroughly and strictly up-to-date and have the very latest thing going in projection machinery, you must interview Mr. George Kleine, or one of his many agents, and secure the Edengraph machine. After you have got it, there won't be any doubt in your mind as to what it is, because the Edengraph does not look like anything else in heaven or earth or under the earth in the way of projection machinery. To begin with: Its magazines are set a little to one side of the mechanism, and the lower one is exactly below the upper one; that is to say, in line with the upper one, front, back and sidewise. The magazines are of pressed steel—fireproof, of course—round in shape, solderless; and the fire trap is so arranged that the film is put in at the side, instead of having to be poked through the trap itself.

The gears and mechanism are entirely enclosed, and the intermittent movement runs in an oiltight, dustproof casing. The gears themselves, or the most of them, are of phosphor bronze: the highest grade of friction metal known to mechanics. These gears are very accurately cut and closely fitted; so that, when the machine is in motion, it sounds almost exactly like a high-grade sewing machine, making practically no noise at all.

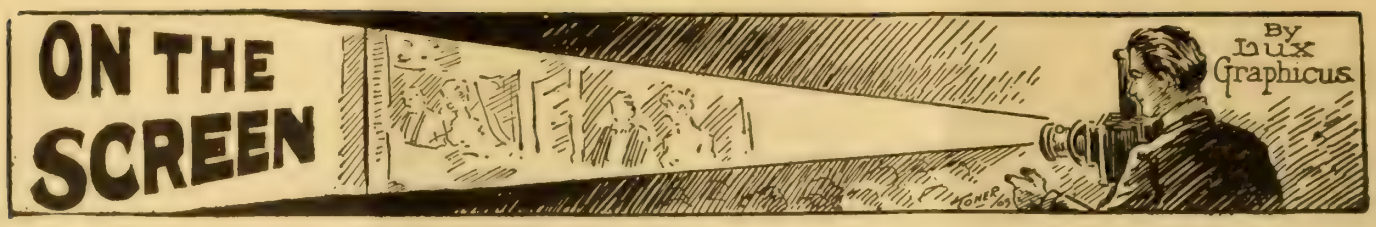
One especially unique feature of this machine consists in the fact of its entire accessibility. The gear casing is laid open by merely raising an iron sliding shutter. The gears, flywheels, intermittent movement, and, in fact, practically everything about this machine, can be removed merely by the loosening of a few screws.

Its automatic fire shutter governor is inside the flywheel, and is remarkably simple, both in construction and in operation. To set the shutter, one merely has to loosen a thumbscrew on the gear side of the machine and, after moving the shutter in any desired position, re-tighten the thumbscrew. The take-up of the machine is an ingenious arrangement whereby the belt is given a certain amount of tension by a spiral spring inside the cast hub of an idler arm. The tension is readily adjustable. One of the strong points claimed for the Edengraph is the simplicity of operation in threading. One of Kleine's salesmen asserted that it could be threaded complete in less than twenty seconds, although perhaps the average operator would not be able to make such a record as that.

The lamp house is roomy and high enough to take a 12-inch top carbon. The lamp itself is a substantial piece of mechanism, with all necessary levers for convenient manipulation, and its carbon arms and clamps are made of cast steel. This metal unquestionably will stand a much greater strain than the bronze ordinarily used for carbon arms.

The machine, taken as a whole, is remarkable for its simplicity, and, as before remarked, for its accessibility and convenience in manipulation. The materials from which it is constructed are of the best; and in workmanship and mechanical exactitude it is second to none. Taking all these things into consideration, it would seem that the Edengraph should be a welcome addition to the list of projection machinery. It would also seem that its promoters ought to reap a large degree of success as a reward for the evolution of a machine giving such beautiful results on the screen.

And such pictures! We had been invited by Mr. Willis, the manager of George Kleine's office at 19 East Twenty-first street, to witness a special exhibition of Selig's great film, "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest," soon to be issued, and of which we will speak in another article. Incidentally we were shown a few beautiful specimens of Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse photography. Altogether our visit was well repaid—in fact, it was a great stimulus to us in our tortuous path of duty. In the Edengraph George Kleine has a good machine; in his film importations he has the pick of the European market, and in the genial Mr. Willis, who is always ready to show you these things, he has a worthy representative of sagacity and business ability.



By the time this number of The Moving Picture World reaches the hands of its many readers the Jeffries-Johnson fight will be over. It will have been fought or decided. As a man of sporting experience, permit me to say that a fight and a decision are two totally different things. It is gravely open to doubt whether there will be a fight. But it is tolerably certain that there will be a decision. In other words, the great public, or rather a large section of it, in its heart of hearts, believes that it is a frame-up. That is what I think, from a careful study of the photographs of Jeffries and what he is doing. He is doing too much; he looks too old. The other man is doing, and has done, very little, and looks as though he could make rings around Jim Jeffries. But he won't be required to do that; he will take his punishment from Jim Jeffries for a consideration.

A feature of the situation, of course, is the enterprise of the Vitagraph Company, with its squadron of camera men working to secure every movement in the ring. For the sake of the Vitagraph Company, for the sake of the business in general and for the sake of the public, I hope there will be a semblance of a fight—though if what Mr. Jeffries says is true, there won't be any fight. James Jeffries, according to the newspapers, has vowed to put the negro out of business in one round, so as to render the pictures valueless. This is what I read in the newspapers and, for the sake of the picture business, I hope that it is not true.

I should not be surprised if there were not several versions of the Jeffries-Johnson fight. Though this contest is to be fought at Reno, Nev., yet in and round New York City, Mr. Jeffries and Mr. Johnson are fighting, or are said to be going to fight, before a camera, so that the public may have a variety of pictures to choose from. In plain English, pure fakes have been threatened. No doubt a certain market will be obtained for these pictures. There is a market for everything in this world, otherwise how should we all live?

I forget the name of the fight, yet no doubt some of my readers will recall the incident and the names of the competitors, but in London a few years ago, I saw a film which lasted on the screen a very long time indeed. It contained, if my memory does not deceive me, 50,000 pictures, which would be equal to three and one-half reels. In other words, it supplied an afternoon's entertainment. I fancy this was the battle between the redoubtable Fitzsimmons and Corbett. Anyhow, it created an enormous amount of interest.

I was only slightly interested in the picture, at the time of which I speak, but I was interested in photography, and curiously enough I remember giving away to some reflections then, entirely resembling those now suggested by the Jeffries-Johnson fight, to wit: On Monday, July 4, 1910, I shall probably be seated at luncheon in New York City, when an interesting fight between a white man and a black man is taking place in Reno, Nev., some 2,000 or 3,000 miles away. Why can't I drop a nickel in a slot and in a few minutes or seconds see a reflection of that fight in progress? In other words, why can't the motions of the fight be telegraphed to me just as a written message or sound waves over the telephone?

Does this look too fantastic, reader? Probably to many who do not follow current scientific progress, the idea looks absurd. But it is not. A few years ago, Zeppelin's airship looked absurd. Now it is an accomplished fact. The aeroplane looked absurd. Now it is also an accomplished fact. "What! Travel through the air in a ship," people might have said a very few years ago. "Impossible." Yet last week the Zeppelin air liner, "Deutschland," made a successful first trip in the air over a great slice of Germany.

At this very moment, between Paris and London, there is a regular service in operation whereby portraits, and I believe views, are transmitted by wire. For example: Something happens in Paris this afternoon and a photograph is obtained of it. That photograph is reproduced on a sensitive surface—for the sake of argument we assume it to be selenium, and this selenitic message or image is transmitted over the wires, received on a sensitive surface in London, and so becomes again a photograph. This process is in actual operation in Europe. I believe the inventor of it is, at present, in this country with the object of establishing means of transmitting pictures and the like across the Atlantic.

There are many parallels in science. Basically between wireless telegraphy, the telephone, the phonograph, the electric light, and other manifestations of energy, I say basically between all these things, there is very little difference. They are, as I have said, manifestations of energy or matter in motion. Light and sound, if you study them, are closely related in their phenomena and effects. Light has its spectrum, sound has its octave on a musical instrument like the piano.

I trust that the intelligent reader who is interested in the fundamental aspects of moving picture progress will grasp my meaning. It is this: that in the transmission of moving pictures by wire the problem to be surmounted is by no means insoluble. In fact, any man of science will tell you that the key to its solution is in the hands of every man of sufficient electrical or chemical knowledge. Marconi only carried out old principles. Zeppelin has done the same. So with the Wright Brothers, Curtis and the rest of them. They have discovered nothing; they simply have been intelligent enough to reduce theory to practice.

That is all that is needed to make the telegraphic moving picture practical. Before long, we shall sit in our offices and see a ball game in progress—that is to say, if the boss will allow us to—just as in some cities you can turn on an electrophone and listen to a man speaking in a public building say 500 miles away. But assuming the telegraphic moving picture to be photographed, what will be its practical value in everyday economics? This, of course, is a very hard thing to say, but I can conceive of a new kind of moving picture theater rising to supply a demand that might exist. For example: There is something doing round about us every day of the year, and we would naturally like to know what is taking place at a distance, whether it be on the race track, in the ball field, on the ocean, in the parks, in the fashionable centers, yachting, swimming, golf, public functions, fashionable thoroughfares and the like, in fact curiosity as to what is going on elsewhere is implanted in every mind. Otherwise we should not look for the daily papers.

When the telegraphic moving picture becomes popular, it will, without interfering with the dramatic moving picture, educational and other subjects, to my mind topicalize the picture. You remember the camera obscura of your youth? You could go into a little house and see on a polished surface a reflection of a scene, say half a mile away. Here you have the germ or root idea of telegraphic moving pictures. All you have to do, say in Reno, is to put up a reflecting surface by the ring side, and to convey the image thus obtained by telegraphic means to where it was needed or asked for. The receiving station will, of course, have to be in a position to duplicate and multiply the pictures to an enormous extent. But in the hands of modern engineers that would be a mere bagatelle.

So you see, ladies and gentlemen, "the moving picture is only in its infancy." This is a much maltreated phrase. The next man I hear say that the moving picture is in its infancy without giving me some idea as to what he thinks the adolescence of the picture will be I will kill that man as a shallow, superficial, unthinking bore. The type of man we want in this business is the man who points out concrete possibilities for the picture, not mere abstractions. The Moving Picture World is ripe with many suggestions as to future possibilities of the picture. It is the only publication of its kind which looks ahead in this matter. And in looking ahead now it sees plainly, or more plainly than anybody else, that the best developments of the picture must be along the lines laid down by the scientific method. As the scientific method is determinedly applied to the question of the electrical transmission of moving pictures, that problem will assuredly be solved. Amen!

During the past few weeks I have discovered that, vast as the moving picture business is in its scope, it has not covered all the real, money-making, go-ahead managers. I was walking along Forty-second street the other day and was stopped no less than eight times by distinguished gentlemen who "know the business from A to Z." Each one informed me that he was aware I was either directly or indirectly associated, or connected, or in correspondence with some officer, clerk, office boy, or other supernumerary of the company headed by a gentleman who had secured the exclusive moving picture photographic privileges of the famous Reno fight. I refrain from mentioning more definitely the fight—that is, the names of the principals—for the very good profitable reason that I do not wish to give any free advertisement. I am sure that neither Mr. Jeffries, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Rickard, Mr. Gleason, nor any of the less important figures in the affair would allow me to use their names.

I promised each inquisitor to give him a tip in my next letter to the Moving Picture World. I always respect a promise. Being "in touch," as I was informed, I wish to impart a secret: If one or the other of the proposed combatants does not drop dead the fight will take place. If the pictures are taken and turn out all right there will be a chance to make money. If that chance comes about it will take money to develop it. This may sound like the famous Coney Island echo, "I never saw you before, but I can tell you your name." It is nevertheless a fact that money makes money.

To be serious, I want to say I never saw such a managerial craze as that which exists at the present time. I never saw more people with so little capital display so much talent. All over the country real estate, feed store, stock raising, ice cream makers, popcorn poppers, hardware merchants and cream soda manipulators are springing to the front. The sagacity displayed is wonderful. They are flooding the country with the most stupendous offers. Little towns that boast of the possession of a gas house and a fully equipped hose carriage come to the front with astonishing alacrity. They offer the opera house for a full, free, uninterrupted exhibition of the fight pictures. Each offer is accompanied with a guarantee that there will be no opposition by the clergy. Of course each writer reserves to himself a certain percentage of the receipts.

My table has been heaped high for the past week with letters from all parts of the country inquiring as to who would make the best Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures and which would be the best source through which to secure the exclusive right of production. A glance at the letterheads of most of the sheets has convinced me that business in the tailoring, butcher, grocery, insurance, and many other lines of business is either at a low ebb now, or will be by the time the fight pictures are furnished.

I have no authoritative information on the subject, but I feel quite convinced that if the fight pictures are worth anything at all to the public they will not be served out as ice cream sandwiches. It must be remembered that it has taken more than will pay for a month's lodging to clinch the exclusive. Some people say the amount was $200,000. Whatever the sum was it was paid in cash and that sum must be cleaned up in addition to the traveling and other expenses, not to mention the cost of film. I am inclined to believe that the $200,000 figure is correct. If it is, let somebody sit down and figure on how long it will take to make the amount of the cash deposit. Many exhibitors figure that they will get the fight as a first run. From their standpoint the idea would be an excellent one. But let the regular exhibitors disabuse their minds of such thoughts. There are too many men in the field with more money.

I was speaking to a well-known New York theatrical manager recently, and he asked, before mentioning a figure, that his name and identity be withheld. He stands ready to pay $12,000 for the first three weeks, or give a liberal percentage of the net receipts outside of other talent he may see fit to engage. Can any picture house compete with such an offer? It is reported that $150,000 has been offered for the Canadian exclusive. I think this offer is rather high, and yet I can figure that in at least four Canadian towns, on a basis of 70 per cent. to the managers of the pictures, the net receipts to them will be $30,000 for the first week.

Wall street is certainly not in it, and copper stocks must soon rest in Lawson's lap for the Summer.

I was forced to smile the other night as I listened to a quartette of theatrical men in the corridor of a hotel not far from Forty-second street in New York. One of the party was a well-known moving picture man, and this is what he said: "Well, what do you think of that old sonof a gun Rock going in and clinching that deal? Had I been tipped off when he started West I would have bet my Panama against a collar-button that he would not get a look in, and yet he lands."

There is no mistake in the conclusion that next to the principals and managers of the affairs, "Pop" Rock is certainly in the limelight. There he stands with a cocked-up cigar in his mouth, a freshly cropped moustache, and a glittering array of glisteners. As one of the hotel corridor debaters remarked, "They have a man there with the stones, and that's going some."

I happened to be in a film exchange the other day when an operator who had called for the reels to be used at his place asked for posters for the Jeffries-Johnson fight. He said his boss wanted to get them posted up in time to work up business. Everybody laughed but the owner of the exchange, who saw a fight coming to him when the exhibitor finds out that Jeffries and Johnson are not, after all, in the first-run class.

Here is a pretty good story told in an exchange the other day: An exhibitor attended church and listened to a sermon denouncing the coming match at Reno as a blot upon the country's history. After the service a member of the congregation asked the clergyman if he really thought the Jeffries-Johnson fight would be a disgrace. The answer was in the affirmative. "Why do you have that opinion in connection with this affair more than others?" was asked. The reply was: "I speak only of this one." To which the questioner replied: "Well, you must have been sound asleep when Gans and Nelson fought in the same place and the whole country seemed to be interested in the event." "Oh, that was quite another case," rejoined the gospel expounder; "in that case there were two combatants who made their living by pugilism. In the present case one of the principals is a clergyman's son who was taken from his farm to gratify the unlawful wishes of people who gloat upon depravity."

It certainly seems hard that a man should be taken from the path of rectitude in order to wrest the championship from the colored race, and incidentally provide crowded houses for the moving picture men.

THE MIRROR SCREEN IN NEW YORK.

At last we in New York are to be permitted to see the effect of the mirror screen. Messrs. Tuck & Manning, 406 Gaiety Theater Building, New York City, have been appointed exclusive agents for Greater New York and they have already taken orders for five screens to be installed here. We will announce the locations of these screens as soon as possible.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors and Film Renters' Association of Hamilton County desires a list of all organizations in the United States, namely: Exhibitors' Associations and Film Renters' Associations. The secretary of any organization of this character will greatly oblige by sending address of their association to T. A. Nolan, President, The Motion Picture Exhibitors and Renters' Association of Hamilton County, 709 Vine street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

"THE LORD'S PRAYER"—ILLUSTRATED.

To the crop of new members that has been sprouting this last Spring, I would like to give a few words of warning. The crop has been so great that it is impossible to keep a correct list of the ones now trying to produce, of the ones who intend to manufacture in the near future and of those who have already made a failure of it. Some of them claim that if we want to go back a few years, we will find that most of our prominent licensed manufacturers started with very little money. It is true, very true; but a few years ago, as a matter of novelty, any old thing was good enough as long as it would move on the screen. Things have changed. The public has been educated and the increasing demand for educational, industrial and scenic productions, shows plainly that a manufacturer wishing to remain in the field must have large capital at his disposal to enable him to spend thousands of dollars on a negative alone, as the cheap negatives made at a cost of $250 are of no value, except to make a few prints for the out-of-date dumps.

These cheap negatives have been the main cause of our troubles. Very weak or sensational in stories, acted by inferior actors and staged in the cheapest manner, they have aroused the indignation of the better classes, of the clergy, of the newspapers and of the authorities. The new manufacturers, like the dog in the French fable of Lafontaine, always believe that they have the worst of the deal and that their neighbors are the privileged ones. The fable tells us that a dog, carrying a bone in his mouth and passing over a small foot bridge over a stream, saw his shadow in the water, and as the water acts not only as a mirror but magnifies, he believed that his own image was another dog with a still larger bone. The foolish dog, pushed by jealousy, jumped into the water, ready to fight the supposed other dog and capture the bone of contention. We know the rest. The dog met a flat failure and lost his own bone. Grocer clerks, race track men, shoemakers, etc., trained and qualified in their respective trades, should not embark in a vocation in which they lack the talent merely because their neighbors have made a success of it.

The new manufacturers seem to overlook the point that motion picture making requires men possessed of certain natural gifts. It is not given to every one to be a clever actor or good singer. Many men and women have spent vast sums of money to train their voices, yet they could never attain the success of our great singers, because all of our great artists have been naturally gifted.

To be a successful producer of motion pictures, the manufacturer must be a born artist and if he is not naturally gifted he must be an experienced business man, with enough capital back of him to hire the proper brains and talent. A gambler by profession can make more money by remaining at his nefarious trade than by going into the moving picture field, because a gambler naturally has none of the qualities to bring into play the best sentiments of humanity. On the other hand, a born actor, who can give the last delicate touch to a picture, would ruin himself if he was running a gambling house, as his good disposition would not permit him to cheat the innocent victims.

The licensed manufacturers, by limiting themselves to a small number and by limiting their releases, are in full control of the best part of the market and consequently are assured of a certain output, enabling them to spend vast sums of money on their negatives and in the building of new and more improved studios and factories, to still improve the quality of their productions.

I ask the other licensed and Independent manufacturers to not be offended if I pass them in silence at this writing, as I wish especially to call the general attention to a notable film, "The Lord's Prayer," and I will preface my remarks by an acknowledgment of what Mr. Geo. Kleine has done for the betterment of moving pictures.

Mr. Kleine is well known for his persistent efforts to push ahead the educational pictures and it is through his constant efforts that he has induced the manufacturers whom he represents to produce the following latest releases: "The Fall of Babylon," by Gaumont; "The Penitent of Florence," by Gaumont; "Judith and Holofernes," by Gaumont; "The Story of Esther," by Gaumont; "St. Paul and the Centurion," by Urban-Eclipse.

Although the above productions required much talent on the part of the actors and managers and involved great expense, they were easy work compared with "The Lord's Prayer" as they were historical subjects that did not require any composition to represent them on the screen.

"FORGIVE US OUR TRESPASSES."

Still the producers had to use much brain work to condense these historical facts into short yet easily understood scenes.

"The Lord's Prayer" called for some ingenuity to find a special scene for every sentence, and scenes portraying the real meaning of the words of the prayer. Mr. Gaumont solved this problem and Mr. Geo. Kleine has secured a film that made everyone gaze in rapture upon the canvas—a gaze that denoted deep thought, for such a truly magnificent and beautiful subject, we might safely say, has never before been produced.

To this add the high quality of the work and you have a film that will uplift cinematography and win for this class of amusement praise and recommendation from the pulpit. If the good work goes on, the clergy will no more decry the motion picture theaters but will become regular attendants and recommend them.

This is what money and talent will do and the present regeneration of the moving picture shows once more that the cheap negatives, acted by poor actors and staged with no intelligence, will be a menace to progress if they are permitted to find their way to the show houses. We know how bitterly the clergy and the press have been against moving pictures, and now that they show a little leniency why not urge our manufacturers to redouble their efforts to gain the moral support of the community by showing first class pictures.

Mr. Kleine, proud of the great success obtained for these fine productions, has submitted to his manufacturers other biblical subjects and before long we will be invited to witness on the screen a series of new master pictures.

"The Lord's Prayer" will mark a new departure, will at last show to the clergy and better classes that motion pictures are no more a toy to amuse the common people but are to-day taking their proper place as the geratest educator of the world. We had already a large number of historical and religious subjects well fitted for church work but the clergy in general paid little attention to them, believing they were incongruous mockeries. "The Lord's Prayer" will prove otherwise. J. M. BRADLET.

NOTED EDUCATORS ENDORSE MOVING PICTURES.

Speaking before the playground and school extension delegates at the convention in Rochester, N. Y., a few weeks ago, two prominent figures in the educational world paid the following tributes to the value of the moving picture in the educational field:

Clarence Arthur Perry, chief of the Bureau of School Plant Utilization Inquiry of the Sage Foundation, said of his impression:

"Upon the heroism of modern life there has appeared no mechanical force more potent or magical in effect than that wielded by the moving picture machines. Whether its immense educational value shall be realized or whether its power shall be wasted or exerted for evil depends upon the foresight of society.

"In attaching it to your splendid school system you people of Rochester are not only securing an aid of extraordinary educational efficiency, but you are helping to create a demand for good and wholesome films and thus are exerting a purifying influence upon the whole moving picture industry."

Dr. Henry S. Curtis, second vice-president of the Playground Association, spoke enthusiastically of the addition of moving pictures as a part of the community educational and recreational equipment.

"I believe," said he, "that within the next few years geography, history, the industries and many other branches will be taught with the aid of moving pictures. They have come to fill a great need in the recreational life of the people."

MOVING PICTURES IN SCHOOLS.

It is only a question of time when motion pictures will be universally employed in schools for educational purposes. They present as nothing else does a panorama of the world, and when the subjects are well chosen are highly instructive. What the illustrated lecture has done to furnish the adult public with a comprehensive and accurate idea of the people, customs and scenery of nearly every country and every clime the biograph will do for school children.

Rochester claims the distinction of being the first city in this country to introduce the biograph into the school, and other municipalities have followed the plan. The Playground Congress, which met in Rochester a short time ago, viewed the scheme with apparent favor. Of course much that is now seen in moving picture shows is not suitable for the schools, partly because some of the subjects are not wholly fit and partly owing to the lack of instructive features in others. Yet since the censorship of these pictures was undertaken no child can visit the best of the theaters and fail to absorb something of permanent value. New York City has not tried the experiment of supplementing the blackboard and the illustrated geography with the biograph, but that does not mean that the Board of Education is opposed to the idea. Only subjects which the scholars are studying should be presented on the canvas, which would thus make instruction the predominating note. For instance, if a class was studying the peoples of Asia, or the fauna and flora along the wonderful Amazon, the moving picture machine would serve to impress the essential facts as nothing else could.—Brooklyn "Standard Union."

SUPERINTENDENT SAYS LACK OF FUNDS STANDS IN WAY.

"Moving picture machines should be installed in the Milwaukee public schools," said Superintendent of Schools C. G. Pearse, when told that the school authorities of New York were thinking of equipping all the schools with moving picture apparatus.

"The only thing I can see against it as far as Milwaukee is concerned is the fact that the Board has not the $50,000 necessary for the equipment. The moving picture as a means of education is highly practical."

THE ALLIANCE PRESIDENT SATISFIE D WITH THE RESULTS OF HIS MISSION.

Mr. Robert G. Bachman, president of the Alliance, who was the dove of peace circling between Fourteenth and Twenty-fifth streets, makes the following statement:

"The outlook for the film business, in general, from the entire independent side, has never looked as cheerful and encouraging to me before, now that harmony prevails throughout the independent ranks, and that the independent manufacturers have made extensive improvements in the way of producing such films as will be equal to any of the highest class productions.

During my visit here in New York I found that the misunderstanding which prevailed among the manufacturers could easily be explained. They were all trying to accomplish the best and yet they were pulling at the wrong end of the rope, and it took but a short time to convince both sides of the independent cause that the difference could be patched up, and that they would "live happily ever afterward."

Now, with the support of obtaining the best pictures in the world, it will enable the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance, who will work in harmony and conjunction, to obtain the very best trade, and every exchange now doing a profitable business will triple their profits by this support. The Alliance will work in harmony with the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, and all those members will have their support. Never before have I seen a better future, and it is up to those who divined it to put their shoulders to the wheel for the betterment of the business to accomplish its end.

I had the pleasure of being entertained by some of the independent manufacturers, who took me around to their studios and film manufacturing establishments, and from experience as a film manufacturer myself I can safely say that the new improved laboratory and film manufacturing plants of the independents in New York will be a surprise to those who might go to the trouble of making an investigation. I have seen some of the best plants that are now in operation, and as soon as these new factories are completed I am quite sure there is nothing in America or abroad which will equal them from a practical standpoint.

The Alliance members will now have the opportunity of their lives to secure the best products in the world by the Fall, and if they would conduct their exchanges in accordance with the Alliance rules and regulations, they are bound to succeed.

The exhibitor has become acquainted with the rapidly improving quality of the independent features, and it is only a question of a few months when the independent exchanges should enjoy at least sixty per cent. of the exhibitors' trade throughout the United States, and in order to put the exchange man in touch with the actual situation we are going to call an Alliance special meeting on July 16 and 17, to take place at Niagara, N. Y.

CARL LAEMMLE.

"The Marked Time Table" (Biograph).—A moral lesson for parents is boldly proclaimed in this picture. Sometimes the maternal tenderness of a mother leads her into indiscretions regarding her son, and in this instance that appears to be the source of the difficulties which befall the young man. But when he robs his father a change occurs and he departs to begin anew elsewhere. The picture itself is not so powerful, perhaps, as what it suggests; but it is this subtle influence, this feeling that one has known similar cases that makes it even more dramatic than it might otherwise be. Maybe the producer had no intention of sermonizing, but he did, nevertheless, and he could scarcely have selected a more appealing subject.

"The Motion Picture Man" (Lubin).—An illustrated story of how a motion picture is made, and the interjected incidents which happen during the first part are the funniest of all. It is quite unnecessary to describe this picture. Suffice it to say it is a genuine occurrence and exhibits some of the exciting incidents of motion picture making at their best. It will be very popular because anything which pertains to the making of motion pictures is extremely interesting, and this is no exception to the rule.

"White Doe's Lovers" (Melies).—A dramatic subject, worked out with care as to details and with intelligence on the part of the actors. Like all the Melies dramas it possesses a quality which will make it appeal to most theatergoers as above the ordinary for this class of picture. It develops interesting situations and, assisted by excellent photography, holds the attention of the audience from beginning to end.

"Our New Minister" (Selig).—A picture which all who see it will agree is entirely out of the ordinary run. It contains many dramatic situations and many which will appeal to most audiences as novel and unusual. The story is dramatic, and flows without interruption from beginning to end. It is acted with the spirit of the Selig players and is presented with a perfection of photography which will appeal to those who appreciate excellence of technical work.

"The Judgment of the Mighty Deep" (Edison).—A powerful story, graphically illustrating love, passion, hate, revenge, retribution, remorse, and finally death. The mighty ocean is utilized as a background, and the picture is woven around these elemental passions, developing them with an intensity which makes them stand out separately, each requiring individual consideration. It is, as one competent critic said, one of the most analytical pictures ever put on the screen. One may not, and probably many will not, exactly like it, yet its power cannot be questioned and its marvelous exhibition of all these passions cannot be questioned. Like a great drama, its strength is scarcely appreciated the first time it is seen. One must go back again and again. As one becomes more familiar with the thought and action the underlying forces become clearer and the fundamental principles upon which it is based appeal more and more strongly. This can be rightfully called the great picture of the week.

"A Curious Invention" (Pathe).—A transformation picture representing an invention which turns back the hands of time and makes old persons and old things change to a former time and age. As a transformation picture it has some merit, but it is mildly amusing only.

"Catching Fish with Dynamite" (Pathe).—A pretty enough Milanese picture, representing how the natives use dynamite in stunning the fish so they are the more easily caught. There is not much beyond the picturesque scenic attraction to interest the observer.

"The Cheyenne Raiders" (Kalem).—A Western picture representing travel over the old Santa Fe trail. There is an Indian raid, a girl captured, pursuit by soldiers, the rescue of the girl, the Indians' stand, then the final plunge over the precipice. One character impersonates Kit Carson, the famous scout. It must be admitted that a great deal of ingenuity has been developed in this picture, and the character studies are as accurate as it is possible to make them. The leap over the precipice is actual, and is one of the greatest thrillers yet seen. Costumes and acting are in accordance with Cheyenne Indian usages, adding one more to the list of films which have a historic value quite apart from anything which may develop in the story.

"A Family Feud" (Vitagraph).—A pleasant picture illustrating how Dan Cupid interfered to end a feud and brought about two weddings in its place. The clever ruse of the two dropped letters works to perfection, and shortly there is a much enjoyed family party in which a happy quartet take part. It is a picture which is good to close the show, as it is full of merriment as well as good sentiment—the kind of problem picture that will please everybody.

"The Forest Ranger" (Essanay).—An exciting story told around a gang of timber thieves who are despoiling government forests. There are some dramatic scenes, particularly the one where the deputy is taken from his room and backed up against the wall to be shot. But the girl has been busy, and never having approved of this method of obtaining timber, she has no hesitation in riding furiously to the marshal's office and leading him and his men back to the timber thieves' cabin, where they burst in the door just in time to save the deputy's life. Then the heart interest develops and the deputy shows what he thinks of the girl's bravery by offering her his heart and hand.

"Does Nephew Get the Cash?" (Gaumont).—To be disinherited after swallowing one's indignation for months through all sorts of unpalatable tests is not a pleasant experience, yet the nephew who wants the uncle's money succeeds in doing it until one day he thinks the beggar is not his uncle in disguise, when he vents his feelings in a vigorous lambasting, only to discover that he has made a mistake and is told that he has lost the money.

"Lakes at Eventide" (Gaumont).—One of those beautiful pastoral scenes at which one might wish to linger long. A rowboat moves slowly and smoothly along the lake shore, disclosing a panorama of beauty indescribable in its beauty and peace. It reminds one of the work of the great landscape artists, only this is in motion, changing constantly and devloping numerous changing scenes, each one more beautiful than the one before it, and ending with twilight out over the lake, which gradually changes into evening, a final glorious poem of nature of unsurpassed loveliness and peace. The photography from the beginning in the bright light to the ending, when the shadows fall heavily in the evening, is perfect. In fact, only praise can be given this picture. It is one of the most beautiful the Gaumonts have ever produced and they have done some notable work in this direction before.

"The Great Train Holdup" (Pathe).—A film possessing all the melodramatic characteristics required to make it popular, and developing a number of interesting situations. The reproduction is of the high class which makes the Pathe work famous, and the situations as they develop are of sufficient novelty to impart quite the average number of thrills. Like all the Pathe's work, this is well done and the picture is almost certain to be popular.

"By the Faith of a Child" (Vitagraph).—A thrilling picture emphasizing the power of a child's plea. Sentenced to death for leaving his post to see his dying wife, the soldier is saved by the simple plea of his little daughter who innocently tells the grand duke the story. They arrive in time to prevent the execution and save the father to his country and his daughter. It is a great picture, skillfully handled, and acted with a pathos that brought the tears to many ever. The spontaneous applause proved that it was the feature of the program.

"A Child's Impulse" (Biograph).—"And a little child shall lead them." Whether or not one is ready to accept this picture in its entirety one must, indeed, admit its dramatic power and agree that it is graced by consummate acting. It is not difficult to understand the indecision which possesses Raymond. Such indecision has been characteristic of men since there were men. But the interposition of the child arouses something in him which lay dormant, as it does in the heart of many a man until an influence like this causes it to blaze forth and sweep all obstacles from its path. Men are impulsive, and while their impulses are not always to be commended, this picture conclusively shows that they can be made right under the proper influence. In reality this picture is a subtle study in the impulses and influences which mold men's actions, and as such it possesses more than the ordinary dramatic and ethical interest.

"Apache Gold" (Lubin).—An Indian story that possesses interest because it shows how Apaches torture prisoners at times. It is a choice of a quick or lingering death, and naturally the victim holds out as long as possible, always hoping for rescue. But the ending is good, and the little family, reunited, go away to live by themselves, with the inference that happiness is theirs.

"Caesar in Egypt" (Pathe).—An Egyptian scene, purporting to represent an event in the life of Caesar. The principal interest will attach to the burning of the palace, one of the most remarkable things ever put on a motion picture screen. It baffles description, so realistic is it in every scene.

There is no question about the strength and popularity of this picture. It will assuredly be accorded rank as one of the great films of the month. If the imagination can conceive a roaring furnace reproduced upon the screen, then it can see this picture. But any words one might utter would be absurdly inadequate to convey any impression of the marvelous reproduction.

"The Long Trail" (Selig).—A picture full of dramatic power and acted with fidelity to the thought of the author and with intelligent appreciation of the possibilities of the piece. From the first appearance of the picture on the screen until it disappears the interest of the audience never flags, and in some theaters a sigh of relief is heard when the complications of the story are worked out to their conclusion. Done in the Selig way the picture deserves to be popular wherever it is shown, and it probably will be.

"The Little Fiddler" (Edison).—A highly emotional drama, presenting a novelty in the fact that a man moving in the best society voluntarily becomes a thief and robs those with whom he mingles. The little fiddler, really the man's own son, is accused of theft, and through that accusation the story works out to its logical conclusion. Done in the Edison style, with good and convincing acting and clever photography, the picture is interesting. Further, it arouses the emotion and causes one's sympathies to act very forcibly in favor of the unfortunate fiddler. A picture which can do this will be quite as popular as one that excites one's laughter. One may well predict for this picture long popularity.

"The Unlimited Train" (Gaumont).—Did your dressmaker ever sew a whole web of cloth to your skirt and you drag it through the street? No? Well, then you have missed the exciting experience of this particular individual. However, if it hadn't occurred in one instance thousands of people would have missed a good laugh. Of course the picture is greatly exaggerated, but nevertheless it is funny.

"The Elder Sister" (Gaumont).—A novelette representing an older sister buffeted by the tides of misfortune, but heroically keeping the household together, which consists of two younger sisters. Fortune favors her and a wealthy gentleman, able to care for them all, marries her. One feels a thrill of satisfaction when this comes about, appreciating the fact that the entrance of money dispels all further difficulties for the three sisters.

"When Old New York Was Young" (Vitagraph).—A love story of old New York, differing in no essential details from love stories of to-day, so far as that is concerned, but worked out against a picturesque Dutch background which affords opportunity to obtain a historically correct impression of modes, manners and customs. The story centers around an erudite chemist, buried in his interminable formulae, who has a pretty daughter, and as always, there lieth the trouble, because no matter what one's own personal ideas may be, wherever there are daughters there is love, and sometimes exciting incidents accompany its manifestation and development, as is shown here. The discovery of a buried treasure determines the question and a wedding is the inevitable result. Some visionary effects are cleverly worked into the picture.

"C-h-i-c-k-e-n Spells Chicken" (Essanay).—A funny picture of Rastus and a chicken. That Rastus wanted a chicken is plainly evident. All his schemes to obtain it were frustrated for a time, however. But while bemoaning his fate one flutters over the fence at his very feet. Then begins a genuine chicken chase. Who ever has seen one knows how true to life it is. At last, however, Rastus succeeds and grabs the bird by one wing. Then as he stands contemplating it with joyous anticipation, it vanishes. The expression on his face when he finds the bird has disappeared is one of the funniest things seen on the screen in many a long day. The whole picture is unusually funny and will put your audience in the best of humor.

"Pat and the 400" (Essanay).—It is not often that the tables are turned as neatly as they were in this instance, but here is one case where a slumming party from Fifth avenue had the tables prettily turned upon them. Pat determines upon retaliation and hits upon the scheme of visiting a house in upper tendom while a musicale is in progress. What happens when Pat and his friends break into that music room furnishes five minutes of sidesplitting hilarity. It is one of the funniest films of the week and never fails to make an audience laugh. Apart from its fun there is a serious side to it. Often slumming parties are quite as mistaken as this one, and even though their zeal is in every way commendable they should acquire more accurate information before they bestow their presence and gifts where they may not be needed.

"The Miner's Sacrifice" (Kalem).—A story of the Western mines, representing a young miner as accused of claim jumping, but saved from lynching at the hands of the miners by the devotion and sacrifice of his pal. Though the story is melodramatic, it is extremely interesting and holds the undivided attention from beginning to the end. It is, like all stories of this type, thrilling, and made even more so by the intensity of the action of the Kalem players. They do remarkably good work and make the picture seem almost real, as though the actual people were before one. The picture will add to the already high reputation of the Kalem players for this class of work.

"Napoleon" (Pathé).—It is impossible in one film to more than merely hint at the dramatic scenes in the life of a great historic character like Napoleon. But a well-informed producer can select incidents which seem to exhibit the historic personage more strongly than others. The selection made for this series seems to convey with reasonable accuracy the real, or fancied, characteristics of one of the great personages of the world. The fete at Malmaison, with Napoleon and Josephine present, is staged so sumptuously that one almost seems to be present. Moreover, in this and all other scenes the picture is historically correct as to setting and costuming. Wherever possible the negatives were made where the event depicted actually occurred. Napoleon took leave of his guards at Fontainebleu, and that is where the picture representing this event was made. The battle of Austerlitz is shown, and here occurred the decoration of the sentry who refused to permit Napoleon to pass without the watchword. And so here and there an event has been taken from the great general's life and placed upon the screen with an attention to the historic details which makes the pictures of more than ordinary educational value. The film deserves more than the commonplace commendation which is accorded any good work. It is beyond that and in a class by itself.

"Juliet Wants to Marry an Artist" (Eclair).—She wouldn't marry him unless he did, and so he goes on the stage, only to discover that life behind the footlights has none of the glamor which looks so alluring from the other side. Then, just as he reaches the required standard, Juliet forgets her vows and actually marries a count. Ah, no wonder oblivion closes in when he learns how she has descended in her ideas. The ending of the picture ends the unfortunate's misery.

"The Crooked Trail" (Nestor).—A sort of Cinderella story which will please because heartlessness is punished and goodness is rewarded. Truly it comes through a crooked trail, but the fact that it comes is sufficient to make the picture attractive. Such changes in fickle fortune always appeal strongly to one's emotions, and in this instance the story is so good and the denouement is so in harmony with what most people would like to do under similar circumstances it is certain to attract more than ordinary attention.

"The Heroine of Pawnee Junction" (Yankee).—A love story laid in the wilds, where a girl is operator at an out of the way junction. There are interesting complications, but the man to whom the girl is pledged turns out to be a despicable scoundrel, and she quickly transfers her affections to the young ranchman who has wanted her long. This sudden shift gives one something of a shock, but perhaps it is not impossible under the circumstances.

"The Witch's Spectacles" (Lux).—Perhaps the possession of a pair of spectacles like this would prevent many marriages, but occasionally one would be found to stand the test, as in this instance. This picture is hardly fair, however, because the woman wore the spectacles all the time. A bit of interpretation of the other side would not be amiss.

"Her Terrible Peril" (Bison).—An exciting picture of a girl falling over a precipice and hanging by her hands until help arrives. It makes one's flesh creep to see her gradually losing strength, but happily help arrives in time and she is rescued by her lover.

"Mother and Daughter" (Powers).—A love story, simple and homely, but going straight to the heart. It represents how so small a thing as a sunbonnet may cause one to change entirely. Dave got the girl he wanted and the swell who admired her money got what he deserved, too. So there was adequate compensation. But the young people were apparently happy afterward, which, after the difficulties and trials which came to them, was no more than their due.

"His Duty."—If I can give any advice to the manufacturer, it would be to abandon the producing field and to practice his great secret of resuscitating dying men. We have a sheriff thrown down a precipice; he appears as dead; he cannot help himself. When a rescuer arrives he has hard work to raise the wounded sheriff, to help him to the road, where from exhaustion the said sheriff falls again on the ground as a dead man. Presto, without the least warning, the sheriff is on his feet, gun in hand and strong enough to handcuff his rescuer. It is really wonderful to see how men badly wounded can be brought back to life in no time, and a manufacturer able to accomplish such miracles could make more money in the medicine business than in the moving picture field. As the manufacturer wanted the public to fully understand that the wounded man was the sheriff, said sheriff was decorated with a star as large as a sunflower.

"A Self-Made Hero" (Imp).—A sort of sarcastic picture of the ruse adopted by one young man in his attempt to secure the consent of a girl's father to their marriage. There are a number of comical scenes, each one of which stands alone as a novelty and develops a situation that becomes very funny. But after a sufficient length of time has elapsed and those most interested have tired out everybody else, the young man staggers into view, looking as though he had been in an encounter with a threshing machine. Of course all objections are removed and the young people are made happy.

"A Martyr to Love" (Eclair).—One of those depressing war pictures, drawn true to life, perhaps, but none the less disagreeable to look upon. To see a girl killed, or see her forced to kill herself because she assisted the man she loved, may be dramatic, but it is scarcely what one wants to see at a picture show. One may not rightfully criticise the acting, or the photography itself. Yet, if the producer had permitted the girl to live, the picture would have had a pleasant ending and all those dramatic scenes would merely have led up to it.

"Getting Rid of Uncle" (Centaur).—The principal interest will center in the impersonation of the maid who is Mrs. Newlywed to the crabbed uncle. She makes life so unbearable to him that he speedily beats a retreat and the young people are left to themselves. The story has some amusing features, and the end is quite pleasant enough to suit anyone.

"One Good Turn" (Centaur).—A story of how a boy's illness and his mother's solicitude worked to make a highwayman renounce his mode of life. It doesn't possess any great dramatic qualities, but its effect is so satisfactory that one may overlook such minor deficiencies and rejoice in the recovery of the child and the reform of the highwayman.

"We Want Your Vote" (Lux).—To be the man who can decide an election is an experience that falls to few men. The fortunate individual here depicted enjoys his temporary importance, but some of those who so ardently follow him have a number of different kinds of trouble as their portion of this amusing election squabble. The picture tells the story very satisfactorily.

"An Exciting Yarn" (Lux).—A war story so graphically told by a veteran that it appears upon the screen. But who would ever have thought of such a method of drying wet clothes? The story contains much of humor, as well as pathos, and works out an attractive picture.

"A Mexican Lothario" (Bison).—A story of a complication of love affairs in which the lover of many women finally meets his deserts and dies at the hands of a man he has wronged. One scarcely knows whether one likes the picture or not. It is suggestive of many things, and perhaps it is better to allow each one who sees it to judge for himself.

"Lieut. Rose, R. N." (Kinograph).—A thrilling drama, yes, perhaps, a melodrama, full of life and acting and working out to a strong climax at the close. Moving picture patrons will not regret their acquaintance with this picture, and after they have seen it through to the close will be ready to look for more from the same house. The producer well understands the placing of his characters and the best method of obtaining picturesque results, and the effect is sufficiently engaging to hold the attention of the audience unwearied throughout.

"A White Lie" (Itala).—A dramatic love story, representing the perfidy of a man as causing his affianced bride to become a maniac. The novelty lies in the fact that when the man returns he is forced to make the crazed girl think he has come for her and she dies happy in his arms. One can say no more for this picture than that it is good for its kind, but few, perhaps, care for its kind.

"The Governor's Daughter" (Thanhouser).—One of those improbable stories that somehow strikes a responsive chord in every breast and makes one want to applaud the Governor when he announces his irregular pardon. But however one may view this picture one is certain to like it. That a convict should save a little girl's life is not altogether strange, nor is it impossible. Yet in not many instances would the daughter of a governor be the one. However, the story works out logically, yet is so improbable that it is in the realm of fairy tales, though none the less interesting. The train wreck, and afterward the meeting in the prison, are both dramatic situations which are well managed, and show careful work in arranging the details. It is all done in the Thanhouser way, and that is only another name for well.

"Too Many Girls" (Defender).—A summer resort idyll, in which It, impersonating something purporting to be a man, becomes the object of the attention of a number of beauties who have been longing for male companionship. But after the perfidy of the wretch is discovered they set upon him in a body, and drive him pell mell amid swishing skirts and well-displayed ankles across country to the lake, where he is immersed and left to soak while the deceived ones console each other and lay plans to obtain recompense from the next unfortunate man who strays their way.

"The Man Suffragette for the Abolition of Work for Women" (Itala).—A comedy which will keep the audience roaring, and is, in reality, a good travesty upon the suffragette movement. In this country the joke is not so apparent as it is abroad, but this is a lively picture and develops numerous very laughable episodes.

"A Plucky Girl" (Powers).—An interesting and very melodramatic story, in which a stenographer plays the leading role and does some great stunts in rescuing diamonds stolen from her employer. At any rate she beats out the professional detective, and that adds to the interest of the film.

"Why Jones Reformed" (Powers).—His girl's father didn't like him, and when she heard her parent coming she hid Jones in the clock. He can't get out, and his experiences in that clock comprise practically every sort of thing that could possibly occur. When finally rescued he is a sight to make tailors weep, and straightway makes a vow to reform and never do the like again.

"Cash on Delivery" (Capitol).—A Western drama worked out with fidelity to the subject and to the original, served up with a great deal of spirit and dash. It is one of those films which will be popular, regardless of the audience to whom it is shown. The details seem to be well worked out and well understood and the picture will unquestionably be popular.

"Sorceress of the Strand" (Eclair).—A transformation picture, representing a young man's experience with a witch. But when the villagers attempt to burn her at the stake the flames assume the form of a bouquet of beautiful flowers, the witch changes into a lovely young woman and slowly vanishes.

"A Millionaire Tramp" (Motograph).—A reproduction on the screen of this well-known play, in which the attractiveness of the original play is retained. While the play was in four scenes the picture is in fourteen. The players make the most of their parts, and probably scarcely any film of the recent weeks, at least, has afforded more actual heart throbs than are called forth by the acting of the leading lady in this piece. In fact, one can scarcely pick out one player as better than another.

THE ABERNATHY BOYS ON THE SCREEN.

As we sat beside the two famous Abernathy boys the other day and watched the expressions on their faces as they gazed in open-mouthed wonder at their own images flitting across the screen, we could not help repeating the lines of the poet of the people, Burns:

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as ithers see us."

It was the occasion of a special private exhibition of the first print from a negative supposed to represent the principal incidents in the 2,500-mile ride of two precocious youngsters, and incidentally they are pictured as brave heroes who rescue a kidnapped loidy from a brace of bold, bad, bloodthirsty brigands. Frankly, we paid more attention to the two kids themselves than to the picture on the screen—their bulging eyes and varying expressions being a moving picture in the life—but we saw enough of the exhibition to say that the photographer had got in some very fine work and the producer had handled his subject in a manner that will do credit to the first release of the Champion Film Company.

Really, Mr. Mark M. Dintenfass, the general manager of this company, deserves praise for his ambition and his effort. If every Independent exchange buys a copy of the film Mr. Dintenfass will not get back the money that he has expended on it. And it is a single tax film. No extra price is asked for it, so every independent exchange will surely order one, for it will be a feature film for the exhibitor. The wide newspaper publicity that has been given to the feat of the two Abernathy boys is alone sufficient to make this film one of the best attractions ever offered to the exhibitor.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Setting the Motiograph Shutter.—Olympic, Wash., writes: "Kindly tell me how to set the shutter of a Motiograph machine, as I am now running one; also what size condenser do I need for 55-foot throw? Stamp enclosed for reply."

Again I must say that no replies will be made by mail unless at least one dollar be enclosed. During the past ten days, twenty-seven requests for personal replies, with only postage enclosed, have been received. Nothing doing. I like to help and accommodate, but I can't afford to pay for the privilege. To set the Motiograph shutter, turn the flywheel in the direction it runs until the intermittent sprocket barely begins to move. Make a mark on the rim of the flywheel exactly opposite some fixed point on the bridge (the bridge is the spiderweb casting which holds the outer boxing of the flywheel, governor, etc.). Next turn the flywheel, still in the direction it runs, until the intermittent sprocket barely stops. Now make another mark on rim of flywheel exactly opposite the same point of bridge. Next measure around the rim of the flywheel between the two marks and make a third scratch mark on rim of flywheel exactly halfway between the first two. Now set this third (central) mark exactly opposite the point of the bridge used to make the first two, and, holding the flywheel in this position, set the inner blade of the shutter so that the rib in its center is precisely in the center of the aperture. Set up the screws which secure it to its spindle and set the other wing exactly central back of the first one, tighten it on its spindle and the job is done. All this sounds complicated, but as a matter of fact it is quite simple. Another way is to turn the flywheel in the direction it runs until the intermittent barely ceases to move and then set the two blades of the shutter so that they are exactly at the point of opening at the exact center of the aperture. The directions as set forth by the Enterprise Optical Company, the makers of the machine, are as follows: "Remove the wing nearest to you (170) by loosening both screws and slipping it off the spindle. Now loosen both screws on the other wing (171), turn the balance wheel with the hand until the slot in the ball socket of the framing device points exactly toward the front of the machine and on a horizontal line. Now place the large wing of the shutter (171) so it comes exactly central with the light opening in the aperture plate and tighten the screws in the hub of the shutter. Put on the inside shutter (170), turn the balance wheel so that the large wing of the outside shutter (171) is exactly central over the light opening. Turn the inside shutter (170) so the large wing is exactly central over the large wing of the outside shutter, having them both central over the light aperture, and tighten the screws on the inside wing."

The cut shows the mechanism of the Motiograph shutter, fire shutter and governor. It is a sectional view, looking down from above.

As to your enquiry about lenses: I would have to know the width of picture, as well as the throw, to advise you. Very likely, however, two 7½ lenses will be all right. Get two 7½ and two 6½ lenses and experiment, trying two 6½, two 7½, one 6½ next the light and one 7½ in front, and vice-versa, until you find what gives best results, and that is "it."

An Excellent Letter from Dixie Land:

Athens, Ga., June 23, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson:

As you have invited comment on "Portland's" case, kindly allow me to make a suggestion. I may be wrong, but if I am it may possibly be of value to someone else. He says they use the Allen adjustable lens, the back combination of which has two lenses. These look to be convex; but, as you know, each of these lenses has two separate lenses cemented together, one convex and one concavo-convex. Now these lenses, as they are next the aperture plate under very intense heat, will sometimes become uncemented, causing air bubbles to appear between them. At least, this is what happened to mine. These air bubbles appear first around the edge. To remedy this, we got specially prepared Canadian balsam and burnt them together so that the heat would not affect them. It is best to have an expert optician do this; one that would not leave any air bubbles. Hoping this will aid "Portland" and others, I remain, a constant reader of the Operators' Column, C. B. STONE.

P. S.—Unless you think this will be of value to someone, please keep it out of the Column—throw it into the trash pile.

We don't throw such helpful letters as yours in the "trash pile," neighbor Stone. Usually the front combination only is soldered, but it may be that the rear one of the Allen is also. I don't remember. Whether or no your suggestion will help Portland remains to be seen, but at any rate it is of real value to the Column. Come again, Brother Stone! The latchstring dangles on the outside.

An Invitation.—As is set forth in an article elsewhere, there are serious objections to the present scheme of licensing motion picture operators. But aside from the city plan of licensing there is another matter which is deserving of the gravest consideration by operators, it seems to me. I would personally like to see the thousands of incompetents either obliged to learn the business properly or else get out of it entirely. There seems but one way to accomplish this desirable result and that is through the extension and enlargement of the scope of examinations. At present examinations are confined largely to determining whether or no the candidate is capable enough to be reasonably safe if placed in charge of an arc light. It would seem to the writer that this, while important, is but a beginning. The candidate should also be examined as to his knowledge of general operating room practice—of the action of rheostats, transformers, motor-generator sets, mercury arc rectifier, and be obliged to explain the different ways of hitching up resistance and its results in amperes on a given voltage. He should be examined as to his general knowledge of lenses, how to measure their focal length and how to figure the size of lens required to project a given sized picture at a given distance, both moving picture and stereo. He should be required to explain what accessories he would have in his operating room and how he would arrange them—in a general way, of course. He should be required to set a Power's, Pathe, Motiograph, and Edison shutter. He should be required to make wire joints and solder them, explain what fuses are for, and name the different kinds; test for shorts and grounds, hook up a dissolver, explain how he would, with rheostats, get one amperage (say thirty-five) on his moving picture and change instantly to another (say eighteen), when the lamp house is shoved over to the stereo., etc., etc., etc.

Now, I want to invite the various operators' unions to send in their views and ideas as to what sort of an examination should be given, remembering that this is something to be studied a little and not answered hastily.

Operators want and should have more salary—much more. In fact, their salaries should be very nearly, or quite, doubled in many cities. But this cannot consistently be demanded by any but men who in turn are willing to study their business and know it from A to Z. At least, that is the writer's view of the matter. We would be glad to hear from every operators' union in the country on this question. Appoint a committee to draft the views of the organization, and while you are about it, also set forth your views as to what scheme of universal license would be most feasible—a license that would be good anywhere in these United States, I mean.

Examinations.—New York, N. Y., writes: "In your article defending the New York City examiners you roast the men who did not know that they could hitch up to anything larger than a No. 6 wire. Granting that it would be better that operators know such things, still, friend Richardson, does their lack of such knowledge really make them any the less competent operators, provided they understand their machine? If so, will you please explain why? Operators don't have to do wiring, since the booth is all fitted up before ever they come on the scene."

Really this letter astonished me perhaps more than any I have received in the past three years, and in that time I have received probably an average of close to a dozen letters daily, some of them containing questions denoting an amazing ignorance on the part of their writers—ignorance concerning their business, I mean. Yes, New York, lack of such knowledge most certainly makes a man a much less competent operator! How do you know the operator won't "come on the scene" until the operating room is fitted up? Is it not a fact that the mere possession of a New York card is used by the operator and accepted by the manager as an evidence of competency, at least to some extent? Now suppose Mr. Licensed Man were sent out to put on a one-night show in a hall having leads of No. 1 wire, and refused to hitch up to it! Can you imagine an operator involved in such a situation? Suppose he secured a job with a traveling exhibitor. Wouldn't such a man be a fine mark! Wouldn't he cut a perfectly swell figure when he had to set his outfit up on different systems ranging from 52 to 220, or even 550 volts pressure? Moreover, do you for one moment imagine that the man who is contented to run a machine without learning more than is absolutely necessary to be able to hold a job in a house where everything is already fixed ready to his hand, is going to be the best possible man? Certainly not! is bound to be your reply, New York, if you are honest. But aside from this it may be said that the operator should be thoroughly posted on matters electrical in so far as pertains to projection. This involves not merely knowing that a No. 10 wire will heat when carrying projection current, but knowing exactly why it heats. Knowing not merely that placing a certain rheostat or transformer in series with a projection lamp gives a certain number of amperes, but why that is the case. And so I might go on enumerating dozens of different things it is absolutely essential that the real operator know all about, else he is not a real operator at all, but merely a more or less poor imitation. The point, New York, lies right here: No man can handle anything on the face of this earth, to the best advantage, which he does not thoroughly understand in all its details.

A Correction.—Last week a letter from Portland came in late after I had sent in my stuff and read the proof.

For the benefit of neighbor Beier, Portland, let me say that "E. J." did sign his full name to his letter, that being required, but the Editor always suppresses names unless it is a letter which it will seem to benefit the writer to have his name appended. Personally I was sure "E. J." was overstating things, and I intimated as much, but nevertheless such things bring out discussion which is interesting, and I take the position that the publication of such a letter can do no possible harm unless by chance the roast be deserved.

In conclusion, let me call to Brother Beier's attention the "Invitation" in another place. Let us hear from your organization by all means.

Kinodrome Machine.—St. Joseph, Mo., writes: "I have been told the Kinodrome machine is a splendid projector. Is this so, and if so, why is it they are only found in the large theaters? Why is it sproket holes are of different shape in different makes of film? Is there any reason for it?"

Yes, St. Joseph, the Kinodrome is a most excellent projection machine, beyond doubt. It is seen only in the larger theaters, usually, for the reason that it is not sold, but is rented, together with the film and operator. In other words, the Spoor Company rents the theater the machine and film and furnishes an operator, all at so much per week or month, and these machines can be had on no other terms, so far as the writer knows. The various manufacturers have to some extent selected sprocket-hole designs of their own, some claiming that one shape is best and some another. The "reason" lies in the endeavor to secure better results in steadier running film. As a matter of fact, however, the writer is of the opinion that the design first selected by Edison has not been much improved upon to date. As to your other enquiry, St. Joseph, it cannot be dealt with in this column for obvious reasons.

MISERABLE WORK.

By F. H. Richardson.

The writer attended the performance at one of the best known houses on Fourteenth street last Sunday and was surprised and disgusted by the work of the "operator." The word operator is placed in quotation marks purposely, and a question mark might well be added. It makes no difference how much knowledge a man may be possessed with, if he cannot, or will not, produce results he is a poor operator. In fact, he is behind the man of mediocre knowledge, for whom there may be some shadow of excuse. But for the man who knows (if the one in question did know) and does not do, there is nothing but condemnation. This man had two machines and ran three reels of pictures to the show. The lens of one machine was out of focus during the entire run of two shows (I stayed for the second show just to see if he would improve matters), and at no time during the entire two shows was there a clear screen. Every moment of the run there was a shadow at top, bottom or sides, and at times it was very bad. Now, it is barely possible that a portion of the fault was due to poor equipment, though hardly likely. In any event, if that were true and the man had any pride in his work or proper ambition, he would promptly refuse, absolutely, to operate equipment with which it was impossible to give results. It is reasonably certain, however, that the trouble lay in the operator himself, and, if so, he has no proper place in an operating room. How long will managers stand for such raw performances? The writer likes to see good work by an operator and likes to compliment it, but he feels it a duty to roast, without mercy, such utterly rotten exhibitions as the one in question, for the good of the business as a whole. There is and can be absolutely no excuse under the heavens for a continuous shadow in the picture. It indicates ignorance or carelessness on the part of the operator, perhaps a combination of both. Wake up, gentlemen, and do your work right, or else get out and let some man in who will! Managers should insist, absolutely, on a clear picture, free from shadows all the time, except, perhaps, once in a while, for just an instant, a shadow may show unavoidably. Anything less than this is poor work, and for poor work there can be no valid excuse. Operators should, on the other hand, insist on proper equipment and refuse to work without it. The writer has seen some excellent work by operators since coming to this city, and he has seen some that he reckons as mighty poor. As a whole, so far as he has seen, the performance of our Western men is distinctly better. Much of the fault lies with the managers who accept such raw work. Also, in most instances, they pay too small a wage to expect to get high-class men. As far as I can see, the work New York operators are doing for $12 to $15, in many houses, would be paid for at the rate of $18 to $22.50 in Chicago. Managers should demand the best of results, but they should be willing to pay for them at fair and reasonable rates.

GENERAL EXAMINATIONS.

By F. H. Richardson.

The writer has been asked whether or no there was such a thing as a "General Operator's Card," entitling one to operate moving picture machines in any part of the country. There is not! and it shames me to say it! Shames me that those we call our public servants and pay to administer justice and conserve our interests should permit citizens to be held up and annoyed while they are endeavoring to follow their daily avocation and earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

As the matter now stands, a Chicago license is of absolutely no value in New York City, though it certifies the holder's competency and cost him ten dollars. Neither is a New York license of the slightest value, except as a curiosity, in Chicago. The operator may hold both a New York and Chicago license and still Pawtucket, R. I., will laugh him to scorn should he display them in proof of his ability to spread motions pictures on the screen in that city. More than this, an operator may hold a license from every licensing city in the Union but one, for each one of which he has been examined by boards of examiners, and for many of which he has paid sums ranging from one to ten dollars; but let him, on the strength of this, attempt to operate a machine in the one exception without first being examined (for the 'steenth time) and he will promptly be stopped and will be lucky if he escapes arrest. Can absurdity and assininity go further?

The writer questions the right of any city to forbid a man to follow his profession and earn his daily bread within its boundaries after another city's board of examiners has certined to his competency. It would seem that such action would be condemned by the courts as against public policy. It would seem that the proper method would be through State license, each State license being good in any other State. To accomplish this I presume it would of necessity have to come about through some sort of Federal Governmental action, and that is about as likely as that the Atlantic Ocean will be set on fire with a match. But at the least a license good within the borders of the State issuing it is entirely feasible and practical and should be brought into being at the earliest possible moment.

TO COVER BIG FIGHT.

Moving Picture Photographers are Hurrying to Reno.

When the big fight is held in Reno, Monday, July 4, in which James J. Jeffries and Jack Johnson will battle for the heavyweight championship of the world, there will be nine moving picture cameras stationed about the ring to make the greatest sporting film ever produced. No doubt by the time the readers of this paper read this, the big battle will have been held and the world will know the winner, and all that will be left to yearn for will be the moving picture record from the cameras of the licensed concerns who made the pictures. These are the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, Selig Polyscope Company and the Vitagraph Company.

Last Tuesday four photographers and assistants from the Essanay Company left Chicago and arrived in Reno Thursday night. They were joined by the photographers from the other two companies and, according to plans prearranged, Friday was spent in visiting the ringside and erecting camera stands about the ring. Great carefulness in every detail will mark the making of this big film and, though the battle may go forty or fifty rounds, the picture makers will carry with them enough of the ribbon ammunition to keep all the nine cameras grinding out the story from the first blows of the combatants to the final knockout. On the night of the Fourth the picture makers will be hurrying East as fast as their special train can carry them. Preparations will be made for the development of the negative film immediately upon the arrival of the photographers at the various concerns and the complete negative will be made of the best parts of the film obtained from the entire nine cameras will be used in making the positives of the fight film. It is estimated that over 60,000 feet of film will be used in the making of this picture. There is no doubt but that this will prove the greatest sporting film ever released. It will be released as soon as the original negative is developed and prints made therefrom.

Just as we go to press we receive the following telegram from Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, who is directing the taking of the pictures for the licensed manufacturers:

Fight films will be licensed. Regards to all.

CAMELS TOO FRISKY FOR THE CAMERA.

The Indianapolis "News" contains the following humorous account of the troubles of the picture maker on the sandy deserts of Gary, Ind.:

On June 15 a battle was waged among the sand hills at Dune Park, east of Gary. English soldiers, Bedouin horsemen, white-robed sheiks, beautiful houris, dusky Berber porters and camels and bears were supposed to have been slain on the scorching sands of the near-desert. The bloodless carnage was staged for the Selig Polyscope Company, which has everything conceivable, from plains to mountains, but no Sahara desert in its laboratory and works. It had come to Gary, where the high sand dunes with sparse vegetation furnish all the backgrounds for the oasis where the "Attack in the Sahara Desert" is to take place in the pictures. The first scenes of the drama were reproduced yesterday, but the friskiness of the camels caused a delay in the shot and shell part of it. Otis Turner was directing scene No. 2, "Entering the Sahara," when his troubles began.

The camels were being led by State street negroes, true to African life and wearing only waistbands. The beasts had no sooner entered the "desert" when they began to act strangely. They snorted with joy and plunged about with such activity that the colored men made a beeline for the nearest "pyramid."

"Dem camels sure done think they am back in de Sahara," screamed one of the fleeing Berbers as he ran for dear life. The ships of the desert, after chasing the frightened negroes, charged the "Coldstream Guards" and utterly routed the king's household cavalry. They frolicked all over the "desert," much to the delight of a number of Gary Mohammedan steel workers who came to witness the battle.

"Fo' the love of Mike," shouted Turner, who stood in the foreground, with the camera operators, "what can be the trouble with those camels?"

Finally the beasts found that the sands of the Gary region are harder to travel over than those of the Sahara and they were rounded up by Lya Shick, who is Colonel Tom Mix, a deputy United States marshal from Oklahoma. The camels then went on strike and refused to work for the rest of the day. It was therefore necessary to fight the battle to-day.

THEATER MANAGER GETS A LESSON.

Elmer Walp, proprietor of a moving picture house in Youngstown, Ohio, lost three films and a machine in a fire last week. The newspaper report stated that the operator was a lad of sixteen years! Probably he will hire a real operator next time. There was no fatalities and no panic. The machine is at the opposite end of the theater from the exits and entrances, and Building Inspector Knox, in commenting on the occurrence, says:

"Here we have had an illustration of the advantages to be derived by placing the machine booths in the rear instead of the front of the theatoriums. Of course the booths are fireproof and the danger of a conflagration from the explosion of films is minimized, but it is panics we fear most and when you put your booth over the entrance to the theater you make it dangerous. The people are bound to try and get out of such places the way they came, in case of fire. If you have a booth over the entrance and exit and they turn and see flames shooting through holes in the booth and have to go out under the booth, they will become panic stricken, and there will be fearful results some day. But at Walp's there was no trouble. The theater was filled, but the people got out orderly and without fear, because the booth was at their back and there was nothing they could see to rouse them to a state of frenzy. I know that the ordinance to change the booths to the rear is being hard fought by the picture men, but I consider it one of the best parts of the proposed building code."

THE PATHE PROFESSIONAL.

Pathe Freres continue to receive orders for the Pathe Professional Model from the Government and the various United States battleships. They supplied, a few days ago, a complete outfit to the Department of the Interior for Government use, and last week installed a complete outfit on the United States battleship Rhode Island. This is the fifth battleship to purchase a Pathe Professional Model during the last few months. In addition to the steady and clear picture this projector gives, the sailors find that one of its great advantages is the fact that their experts report that there is little danger of the machine getting out of order when on a cruise, as the mechanism is built so very separately and is extremely strong. It is easy to see what a strong reason this must be when a battleship is away sometimes two or three years, and may be for a prolonged time several thousand miles from port.

A large number of open airdomes have recently put in the "Hallberg" Economizer on account of the very strong light it gives for the long distances and great amount of light required and the extra large pictures for this kind of work. One of the latest to be equipped by Mr. Hallberg is the airdome at 137th street and Seventh avenue, New York City.

Two weeks ago Mr. Hallberg installed for Mr. Spanuth a double lamp Economizer equipment for his airdome at 181st street and Audubon avenue, New York City, to control a double dissolving stereopticon machine combined with moving picture lamp. In this instance the throw is about 125 feet, and the picture is unusually large. Mr. Spanuth shows a brighter picture of double the size at twice the distance in the open air with the Hallberg Economizer than one of his competitors does indoors under more favorable conditions. This speaks well for the Hallberg Economizer. Mr. Spanuth is very much pleased with it.

CHICAGO NOTES.

In the Chicago "Daily News" recently was paragraphed and pictured an interesting incident in the taking of African hunt pictures by an American camera. A huge rhinoceros which was being photographed greatly opposed the publicity and evinced his opinion by demolishing one of the machines, while the two remaining cinematograph operators continued to turn the crank. Three American cowboys, after a hard tussle, managed to lasso and tie the infuriated beast to a tree. The "rhino" turned the scale at two tons, which demonstrated the power of the horses used, which could just balance 1,400 pounds apiece.

Mr. Ben Huntley was in Chicago recently for the purpose of buying a fresh supply of educational, travel and comedy pictures. The Huntleys, spoken of in Minnesota as the "Monarchs of Pictorial Amusements," are now in their fourteenth season of road work with motion pictures and other high class entertainments. The cinematograph equipment consists of a four-piece orchestra for sound effects and a reserve stock of film totaling in the neighborhood of 5,000 feet.

Mr. Huntley is ably assisted by his wife, Mrs. Myrtle Huntley, and it is their policy to present high class film subjects of travel and education to the high class public, with sufficient comedy to hold the gallery. Mr. Huntley speaks very highly of the Pathe pictures and has all manner of good things to say of George Kleine's importations. The Huntley Shows have their permanent headquarters at Winona, Minn., from which point the entertainments start out under personal direction.

Mr. Julius Stern, of the Laemmle Film Service, returned recently from a most successful trip to Europe. Mr. Julius Singer, of the same company, is enjoying a much needed rest at "Sleepy Hollow," Michigan.

In the future the Chicago Board of Permits will not issue any permits for the erection of Class "4" theaters, unless the seating capacity of such theaters be less than 300. In consequence of this new regulation all new theaters which have a seating capacity of over 300 will be governed by the laws regulating Class "5" theaters, which are more closely watched in regard to fireproof appliances.

* * *

J. C. Deagan, who makes sound effects for the successful exhibition of motion pictures, has been devoting his entire efforts lately to this line of trade exclusively and claims that he is receiving orders daily from theaters for his sound effects and musical paraphernalia, which is known throughout the trade as the best that money and brains, put together, can produce.

Walter Wilson recently purchased the Ellis Theater, and under his experienced management and supreme courtesy, this house should surpass all its competitors in the neighborhood.

Mr. W. E. King, director of the orchestra at the Orpheum Theater, was made the butt of an innocent child jest the other day. A mother and member of her tiny brood were seated very close to Mr. King's pit and after watching this king of sound effects manipulate several "traps," he turned to his mother with a haughty and disgusted look and said: "Mother, wouldn't you think that man would have outgrown those childish pleasures by this time?"

The moving picture in the Ghetto—that is, along Halsted street, between Twelfth and Fourteenth streets—seems to be very popular and is generally presented very well. There are several little theaters in this district, some of which offer vaudeville in Jewish, and some others which show only pictures. Competition between them is pretty brisk, and the films shown are mostly new ones, though in some cases the old are in evidence. Pathe pictures seem to be in favor here, as they mostly tell their stories without the aid of sub-titles, which are useless to people who cannot read them. The houses are about evenly divided between Independent and licensed films, but the licensed houses seem to get the newer.

At Fourteenth and Halsted streets is located a house which featured its vaudeville at the expense of its pictures. The vaudeville did not seem to be at all bad and consisted of a song and a dramatic sketch, both in Yiddish. The pictures were very old, consisting of a split reel, one of whose subjects was an old Pathe comedy and the other something which seemed to be several years of age, very unsteady and poorly photographed, which showed a jewel robbery—a type of subject that has been abandoned for a long time. The projection was fair and the Pathe picture fairly steady. One thing I noticed was the absence of the illustrated song from the program.

A block north of this is another house much like the preceding in some ways. The vaudeville here, too, was in Yiddish. The pictures shown were Independent. "The Power of a Smile" was shown, but ruined by poor projection, the screen being light-struck from the side lights and the film run through the machine very much too fast.

Two doors from this house is a well projected picture in Friedman's Theater. The Gaumont picture, "The Story of Esther," was shown here on its release day, and was deeply appreciated by the Jewish people who patronize these shows. The effect of the pictures was injured by the way in which the manager announced, in a raucous voice, at the beginning of the second and third reels, "We will now give you an extra picture." The operating here was excellent and the pictures were run steadily and smoothly and well lighted.

The next house north was an Independent one in which I found pretty fair operating, considering the fact that the operating room is at the extreme side of the house. The films shown were fairly new ones and were run steadily.

Across the street I found an excellent picture in the Ideal Theater, owned by Mr. I. Natkin, a very nice little house. Mr. Natkin shows two reels of good pictures and no vaudeville. He is an ardent believer in good pictures and would not associate vaudeville with them under any circumstances. When not rushed he shows three reels, but during the evening shows, instead of hurrying three reels through the machine, he cuts the show down to two reels and presents them both properly. He has an excellent piano player, who does much to enhance the effect of the pictures. Mr. Natkin's show draws the attendance of the best classes of business and professional men of his neighborhood, and indeed his theater is one that would be a credit to any neighborhood. It is pleasant and refined in tone, unlike the majority of his competitors; there is no "barker" outside urging the passersby to go within; there are no flaming posters about which have nothing to do with the films shown, as is the case with at least one of the houses nearby. The front of the theater is elegant and simple and lacks the gaudiness and cheapness of the ordinary nickelodeon so much in evidence in the places about it. The films shown are well selected; Mr. Natkin speaks highly of the H. & H. Film Service, which has been supplying him for a long time. "The Story of Esther" was shown here on its release day, and won much approbation from Mr. Natkin's patrons.

At Twelfth and Halsted streets is another house in which there was pretty good projection, the pictures being run steadily and well illuminated. There was nothing in particular to note about this place, which is like several of its neighbors in many ways. This is the most northerly of the theaters in the Jewish section.

About two blocks north there is a little theater patronized exclusively by Italians. The vaudeville consisted of a song and comic sketch in Italian, which brought a good many laughs. As may be expected, this house is using Independent service, since all the Italian films are Independent. The presentation of the pictures was fair. A record film by Croce, of Milan, was shown which was run steadily and was well received. Of course, the Italian films are featured here when they can be obtained. North of this theater the population seems to be almost wholly Greek, and no theater of any kind exists.

The Palace Theater, at Eighteenth and Halsted streets, is another which depends on foreign people for its support. The people in this locality are mostly Polish or Slavish. Here, too, Pathe pictures are popular for their quality of telling stories without sub-titles, and besides the foreign settings of many of the pictures seem more homelike to the people who go to see them. The pictures are pretty well put on the screen, but they suffer in being seen because the house is more broad than deep, and too many seats are located at the sides of the stage, so that the picture as seen from these seats is slightly distorted, due to foreshortening. However, this is not intended as an exclusively picture house, and the vaudeville has been dropped from the program only for the hot months.

Those who denounce the moving picture should pause to reflect on the potential benefits to be derived, at a minimum cost, from these exhibitions. Of course, a great many silly scenes are shown of ultra-sentimental love making and slapstick comedy. But in the better class of establishments what one sees is very often worth the while of serious-minded, busy people, as well as mere amusement seekers.

W. FAY LYNCH,

Kalem's Chicago Representative—A Man of Affairs and Broad Business Training.

We have all noted with pleasure the fact that men of substance have been attracted to the ranks of the licensed motion picture industry, crowding out carnival and ballyhoo men, who ever restless for new worlds to conquer, have either sought other fields or gone over to the Independents in a body. Kalem's representative is one of the substantial kind. Born and raised in the city of Lowell, Ind., when he graduated from college he was taken into his father's general store as a clerk. Later on he acquired the interests of both his father and elder brother in the store and for several years ran the business with great success, in time doubling and quadrupling the business. After a few years as sole owner of the Lowell store he sought a broader field, eventually joining his brother and opening in Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, South America, the largest department store in that thriving city. This enterprise he and his brother, Mr. E. R. Lynch, ran for several years with excellent results. That innate love of country induced them in time to sell out their South American store and return to God's country, where they embarked in the manufacture of paint, locating their factory in the city of Chicago. Recently they sold out this business, although they still own the valuable factory property. Mr. Lynch is the owner of several valuable farms in Indiana and to-day personally operates a magnificent 600-acre farm property adjoining his native city of Lowell. Every Saturday afternoon Mr. Lynch migrates to his farm for a Sunday visit, returning to his duties in Chicago Monday morning. Mr. Lynch ever since placed in charge of the Kalem interests in Chicago has conducted the business to the mutual satisfaction of the Kalem Company and the trade generally. The exchanges all have a good word for the genial Kalem representative.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

At my last visit, the Magnetic Film Service was moving to their new quarters, 123 Shillito place, and as everything was topsy-turvy, I could not judge of what would be the new exchange. I was delighted to find one of the best equipped film exchanges, a model in many respects. On the second floor we find a commodious, well fitted business office, inspiring order and prosperity. The front room of the third story, a large room with two windows on the street, is simply but tastefully furnished, the main piece of furniture being a long reading table on which is found a collection of trade papers, daily papers, magazines, bulletins, etc. This is the reception room, and while the operators wait for their reels they can make themselves comfortable and peruse the different papers. The operators are not allowed in the working rooms. One of the middle rooms is devoted to the delivery department, and this is under the able supervision of a young lady. In the same room is found the slide department. A third room is devoted exclusively to the posters and advertising matter. The film room is a model; every reel is carefully tagged with a tag of a special color, bearing the number of the reel, the date of return and the words "Not Examined." The reels examined and ready for delivery bear a tag of another color, with the date of inspection and by whom it was inspected. In this department we find a tall, nice-looking young man answering to the name of George Washington, and he is proud to state that he is a descendant of "The Father of His Country." The lady stenographer had a little story to tell me, which I will give out, to show that too many of our exhibitors embarked in the show business without any previous experience.

A very prominent exhibitor of Kentucky, who has been operating a theater for some two years, was recently obliged to enter the operating booth, where he discovered a box containing short pieces of carbon which the operator was unable to use. The proprietor inquired from his operator whether or not he could locate a place where these carbons could be ground up and remolded. The operator started to find a place of this kind, and our last report from him is that he is still hunting.

Old films have been called by many names—rainstorms, etc. —yet I discovered a new name at the Magnetic Film Service —strings.

A German lady visited Mr. Black's theater, a 'steenth-run house; then she visited Mr. Brown's place, a first-run house. When she left Mr. Brown's house, Brown asked her how she had enjoyed the pictures, and she answered that she had enjoyed them, but that at the other place the pictures were full of strings.

The Magnetic Film Service and the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company, operating a branch in Cincinnati, have made an arrangement by which they practically divide the licensed output, and consequently their respective patrons do not show the same program on the same day. It would be a great thing if all the other exchanges could come to such a mutual arrangement.

The Southern Film Exchange, under the able management of Tom Reilly, is prospering and is in a position to supply its patrons with the best Independent productions.

Indianapolis gave me a taste of the future of cinematography. I spent the evening of June 21 in Indianapolis. It was a very hot and sultry day, nothing to really invite folks to visit a moving picture theater, but on the contrary to encourage them to jump on a trolley car for some park and some fresh air. Notwithstanding the atmospheric conditions, I was surprised to find an audience of about 75 persons at the Mystic Theater and this at 7 P. M., when most of the folks enjoy their evening meal. At 8 o'clock I called at the Orpheum Theater and was agreeably pleased to see them do a good business. At 8.45 o'clock the Lyric Theater had what we can term a full house, very few vacant seats. These three houses show first class licensed pictures.

At 9.30, as I was passing in front of the Manhattan I could not resist the tempting barker who exerted his lungs to tell us that his place was the coolest in town and showing the very best pictures. The Manhattan is well located on Washington street, the main street of Indianapolis, yet the barker had very little success and I could not understand why folks passed the place without dropping their nickel to see the show. Was it that the pictures were not up to date? Was it they objected to a barker? We know that a barker generally cheapens a place and if the cheap second-hand stores must have barkers, the good clothing stores do not employ them. Anyway, tempted by the promises of the barker, I gave my nickel. Well the barker had told the truth, it was cool in more senses than one.

The Miller Brothers are busily engaged at present in the production of motion pictures depicting the real Western life. These pictures are taken at Bliss, Okla., on the 101 Ranch, and from all reports are very realistic. In a recent production, "A Buffalo Hunt," much rivalry was shown among the Indians, who were greatly agitated by the smell of the meat. It is said that several were severely injured as the outcome and a band of cowboys were compelled to interfere and restore order. Whether this is some clever press agent's dream or not, we are unable to say, but if it is it surely is a good one and ought to get by.

VAUDEVILLE PUT IN ITS PLACE.

The Nickel, St. Anne street.
Quebec, June 24, 1910.

The Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Prior to my purchasing the above theater, I made a most careful examination of all the daily and weekly statements, together with receipts, invoices, etc., and the following figures I quote will probably be of sufficient interest for you to quote in your valuable paper, as I think it clearly answers the most perplexing question, "Does Vaudeville in a Moving Picture House Pay?"

Study these figures carefully, Mr. M. P. Proprietor, and see the little story these figures tell:

August 2 to November 21, 1909, 16 weeks, average daily receipts, $83.47. At this time an opposition house opens and the receipts drop off considerably, so vaudeville is tried to attract. Let us see what happens. The opposition are here and are not running vaudeville:

Without vaudeville—December 27 to February 6, 6 weeks, average daily receipts, $62.60; February 7 to March 20, 7 weeks, average daily receipts, $63.27.

Thus it is seen that the receipts were increasing, and no doubt would have continued as we undoubtedly have the best house in town, while not the best location but let us see what vaudeville does:

With vaudeville—March 21 to May 1, 6 weeks, average daily receipts, $60.32; May 2 to June 11, 6 weeks, $55.07.

Thus it will be seen that instead of getting better it gets worse, and no matter how you look at it there is a loss staring you in the face. So we will now figure the average daily receipts for 12 weeks before and after the vaudeville, and we find $62.66 average daily receipts before vaudeville, as against $58.44 after, making a daily loss of $4.22, which equals a loss of $303.84 for the 72 days. The weather has nothing to do with these figures, as the furnace was going on June 6, and the hot weather did not start until June 12.

Now comes another item. I have quoted you the receipts, but said nothing about the expenses. Salaries are included in expenses, and the total salaries paid these so-called business producers and so-called vaudevillists was just exactly $632 for the 12 weeks. Total loss $935.84, and then we will add to these figures $64.16 for extra advertising, and we are just exactly $1,000 out of pocket. This is not the only loss, having shown that the receipts were improving, and the probability is that they would have continued, how can we compute this loss? We cannot. All we know are what the facts and the figures say. Vaudeville in a moving picture house does not pay.

Any booking agency doubting these facts and figures can have the book, etc., audited—at their own expense, of course.

Suppose you have your books audited, those of you that are asking yourselves this question, and then let the figures talk.

I would suggest that proprietors should go over their statements and work out their average weekly or daily receipts, before and after their vaudeville was added as an attraction, and I think in a good many instances they will find a similar experience to mine.

If they cannot do it themselves, a few dollars for a bookkeeper will be well spent, and the sooner the better. I have also taken the trouble to visit every moving picture house in about ten cities in Canada just to have an idea of what moving picture proprietors are doing, and in the houses where I witnessed vaudeville, I wondered why some of the acts were allowed on the stage at all. In a number of instances I have seen the whole audience actually sit through the act, without a smile or a laugh and not a single hand was given at the end of the performance. For this act I saw the contract, which called for $60 per week, with a change on Thursday. Some of the acts beggar description, and I have seen hundreds of amateurs that would shine like stars in comparison.

An act that will draw is worth money, but an act that is only an act is not only money wasted but a loss to the house as well. In short, I do not think there are any acts that have any drawing power of any quantity that would condescend to work in a moving picture house, and if they did I think the price such an act would require will cause the proprietor to have a fi*

I like legitimate vaudeville, but the average act seen in a vaudeville and moving picture house combined is revolting, disgusting, devoid of any originality or ability.

I am speaking of the average act, and while 10 per cent. of your audience may like it and clap vigorously, don't let that delude you into the belief that the other 90 per cent. like it.

Wishing you every success your valuable paper deserves,

Yours very sincerely,

THE MORALS OF THE SHOW.

Cincinnati, Ohio, June 28, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Moving picture shows some declare to be a menace to good morals and are called by others places of vice. Of all the subjects discussed by the public there is more stupidity and lack of real knowledge displayed by those who would prohibit the moving picture business than any other one thing that is discussed by the people of today. It is claimed by one reverend gentleman that picture shows are the meeting places for the young boys and girls, and are places of vice and ruin. It is also claimed by a Cincinnati merchant that the picture shows are detrimental to business. This gentleman seems to think that the people should not patronize these places, but save their money to buy "shoes." He does not state in his article that he is in the shoe business, but one would naturally infer that he is. Other writers claim that the picture shows are unhealthy owing to the large attendance, etc.

Now, Mr. Editor, I wish to answer a few of these critics who seem to write without any knowledge of the facts. In the first place, it would be impossible to run an exclusive picture show for old people. Naturally, young people desire to be entertained, and a picture show cannot discriminate against the young people. No doubt there are some few undesirable picture shows, but they are very scarce indeed, and can only live in a locality where the people are undesirable. It may not be known to many, however it is a positive fact that the independent picture companies have a censor committee in New York and also in Chicago, and the licensed picture company also has a censor committee in New York. These committees pass upon every picture, and if there are any that are suggestive or immoral they are thrown out and are not allowed to be exhibited. Since the picture shows have been established, crimes have decreased to a large extent. There is a cause for this. I have never seen a picture put on the curtain but what it has had a moral to it. It is claimed by many that the picture shows have been the direct cause of many counties going dry throughout the country, owing to the fact that every picture shown on the curtain vividly depicts the ruin of those who drink to excess. Perhaps there might be one or two cases of crime that some sensational writer might try to attribute to a picture influence. However, this is no reason why a fight should be made against the picture shows. There have been many crimes committed in the schools and churches of our country. The DeRan crime in San Francisco, and the Louisville crime of a few days ago. However, the churches and schools of our country are the foundation upon which the whole government stands, and just because there are a few undesirable picture shows does not mean that they are all undesirable by any means, and the people who are condemning the picture shows know the least about them.

Of course, the young people as well as the old go to the picture shows to be amused and entertained because they are cheap and within the reach of all. Of all the thousands of picture shows, I have never heard of a single murder in one of them. The proprietors are doing all in their power to please the public and run respectable places of amusement. I have been in hundreds of picture shows all over the United States, and I must say I have never seen the people packed in a picture show one-half as tightly as I have seen them packed in the street cars of every city in the United States. Let us hear from some of the critics on this subject. The objection raised about the people spending their nickel is not well taken. We never hear any objection to the rich society people spending from two dollars for a seat at the theater to five hundred dollars for a seat at a social function, and why should anyone object to a poor man spending five cents for an evening's amusement and entertainment?

The picture business is here to stay, and in sight of three years every progressive community will teach in their schools, history and geography by motion pictures. The libraries of the country are now sending out pictures of various places and scenery to educate their patrons. The medical profession, ever awake to live issues which will benefit mankind, realize the great value of moving pictures. The value of the moving picture to surgery cannot be estimated. The poisonous insects carrying the germs of diseases that are depicted upon the curtain at the picture shows teach the people how to protect themselves and to take care of their health and destroy the germs that cause disease. The children raised in the cities are shown country life; the children raised in the country are shown city life, and the scenes, habits and conditions of the cities are depicted upon the curtain at the picture shows in the small towns. This great educator cannot die, but will improve as the years roll on. For five cents we can all see the Seven Wonders of the World, scenes like Niagara Falls, the Red Sea, and the Holy Sea, the Holy Land, the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and all the nationalities that inhabit the earth, their ways and modes of living.

Anyone who condemns all the moving picture shows and the pictures simply because there may be a limited few that are undesirable, has not given the subject intelligent and due consideration and thorough thought. In ten years from to-day some who are condemning the pictures will be lecturing for moving pictures in the churches, and the churches will be crowded with people drinking in the inspiration of eternal life shown upon the curtain by the ingenuity of the man who produced the moving pictures.

The manufacturers of moving pictures in France, Germany, England and other foreign countries are bringing to us the scenery, habits and conditions of all the world, and we are fast becoming familiar with the faces of every ruler and important personage in the world. The rivers, the lakes, the mountains, the valleys and the lands of every nation—in fact, everything most wonderful that nature has produced—is put upon the curtain for the education of the children of this age. It will not be two years before the pictures will talk, sing and do everything that the human race can do, and exactly as it is done. The world through the moving pictures will become acquainted, and the moving picture is the force that will eventually bring about a closer relation of all nations—a band of love and friendship between the people of the whole world.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A MIDNIGHT CUPID. We will all insist that the tramp is the world's most odious mendicant. He is apparently an absolutely useless parasite which all are anxious to exterminate. However, here is one poor unfortunate who was the cause of a great good, for he unwittingly plays Cupid and brings felicity into a couple of tedious lives. Perry Dudley, a young man of wealth and position, is the center of attraction with the matchmaking mothers, as he is considered the season's best catch. The daughters are by no means backward in obtruding themselves to his notice. In fact, he is so annoyed and bored by this bevy of fawning females that his life becomes one of ennui. He longs for a change where people are less superficial. While fulfilling one of his social obligations his house is entered by a poor unfortunate tramp, a veritable soldier of misfortune. The poor fellow has a letter in his pocket from friends in his native village from whence he left when but a small boy. The missive asks that he return and he will be taken care of. He is inclined to go, but cannot make the trip on an empty stomach, so his visit to the Dudley mansion is in quest of food. He finds no one at home, and espying a decanter of wine on the table, in lieu of food, takes a drink. The wine has both an intoxicating and soporific effect, and when Perry returns he finds his nocturnal visitor on the floor in a profound bacchanalian slumber. As he lifts him to a chair Perry sees the letter, which he reads. What a chance. He decides at once to disguise himself and go to the country in the tramp's place, assuming that no one would recognize the deception. Placing a ten-dollar bill in the tramp's pocket instead of the letter, he instructs his valet and butler to take the sleeping tramp out and lay him on a bench in the park. Off Perry goes to present himself as the long-lost native, and has little trouble in convincing the old farmer that he is the personage to whom the letter is addressed. Of course, he is welcomed, but one thing he didn't bargain for was work on the farm; still he must endure it. Another thing he didn't bargain for, but is willing to endure, is the companionship of the farmer's pretty daughter. It is a case of love on both sides. Meanwhile, the tramp awakening and finding the money, resolves to go back to his old home. His arrival is uneventful, as no one will believe him until he shows the farmer several marks or scars of identification as proof, hence the farmer chases Perry off and locks the daughter in her room. But, pshaw! As they appreciate the fact that love has ever given locksmiths the merry ha, ha, they won't let a little thing like that break their romance, so they elope. When they arrive at Perry's mansion the girl is amazed, but is reassured by the presence of a minister, who makes them one just as the old father, who has followed with a neighbor, enters. He not only makes the best of the situation, but considers himself the most fortunate father in Christendom with his daughter making such a match.

THE PURGATION.—Reformation is possible to the most hardened criminal. Many there are who have not had the opportunity of good example, and others who have had, but were indifferent. However, in any case, each must go through the epoch of purgation and suffer tests of their sincerity, the ordeal to be measured according to conditions. The young man in this Biograph story is one of the many misguided youths, who, for the want of healthy moral training, has become a thief. There is something worthy in the boy's nature, which only needed cultivating. He and his companion get into an uptown apartment house by way of the fire escape, and entering the apartment of a wealthy business man, find his daughter, while keeping vigil beside the bed of her baby sister, has fallen to sleep. The sight of the girl, a picture of purity and innocence, arouses higher thoughts in the young man, so he compels his companion to leave and seek elsewhere. Their exit awakens the girl, and she, in attending the child, notices the hot water bag needs refilling, and as it is late she goes to the elevator to have this done, when a drunken clubman passes and offers her an insult. The boy is now hiding behind the portieres covering the window, and seeing the girl's plight, leaps to her rescue, hurling the offender down the stairs. The parents of the girl hearing the scuffle rush out and are overwhelming in their gratitude for the young man's action. The girl herself is impressed. Her father asks that he call at his office that he may show substantially thank him. On the boy's side it is a case of love at first sight so when he reappears at the meeting place of the chums he bids them good-by forever, determined to put the past behind him. Now for the test. He secures employment from the girl's father, he, of course knowing nothing of his past, and in a short time he gains their confidence to such an extent that he becomes the fiance of the girl. Prospects are now bright, but the purgation is still to be endured, and here fate often conspires cruelly. While on a business errand, the boy meets his erstwhile companion. He tries to induce him to take a hand in a job so as to perpetuate the same night. The young man, however, is firm in his high purpose and refuses to have anything to do with his former associate. A robbery takes place at the office of the boy's friend, and when the discovery is made next morning the boy feels sure that his old chum was the thief. The police are informed, but the boy volunteers to try to regain the stolen property. Going to their hovel, he has by subterfuge just succeeded in getting the valuables when the detectives enter. Appearances and record are condemning, so the detective considers the boy a part to the deed, and would have held him but for the confession of one of the crooks. Still, it is a sad blow to the girl and her parents, for he must acknowledge his former character. Still determined to stick to the road of righteousness, he begs the man to give him a chance to prove himself worthy of his confidence. This the father grants.

THE STARS AND STRIPES.—John Mayrant has fallen out of favor with Mistress Dorothy Hall, a little lady with whom he is greatly in love, but who does not feel that John is quite as brave and gallant a gentleman as she cares to bestow her heart and hand upon. Chance favors John when a messenger carrying the news of Burgoyne's surrender, and with sealed orders for Paul Jones, falls wounded at the door of Mistress Dorothy Hall while John is pleading his suit. The messenger being wounded en route, John undertakes the delivery of the message in his place. Arriving on board of Jones' boat at midnight, John delivers the message to his captain. Paul Jones at once orders all sail to be hoisted. The "Stars and Stripes" are flown to the midnight breeze and the ship sets sail for Europe with the news of Burgoyne's surrender, but not before John has succeeded in inducing Paul Jones to take him with him.

To win back Mistress Hall's love and affection is John's one idea, and how well and how bravely he accomplished this task is shown to the audience in one of the most realistic and startling scenes ever produced on the moving-picture screen—the famous sea fight between the "Bon Homme Richard" and the "Serapis." Here are shown the horror and the thrilling glory of the old time sea fight on board a sailing vessel. The scene between decks is particularly effective. Men stripped to the waist and covered with blood and powder are serving the guns, with the dead and dying lying around and powder monkeys dashing here and there in the smoke of battle. A ball crashes in the side of the vessel and causes death and destruction. The men desert their guns, but John Mayrant drives them back to their post of duty, himself staggering from a half dozen wounds.

Next we are shown the upper deck of the "Richard." Shells are bursting, cannon roaring, officers hastening hither and thither with orders, while on the poop deck we see Paul Jones, calm, cool, the acme of courage and bravery, calling out his orders, receiving the news that his ship is sinking and fire is destroying it. "Take the water that is sinking us and quench the fire that is burning us up!" is his order.

"Do you surrender?" comes the shout from the enemy's vessel. The reply rings out, "Surrender! Why, I am just beginning to fight!" A moment later and the "Serapis" is seen to crash into the "Richard." "Boarders away!" rings out the order, and John Mayrant is the first to respond to the call. It is now a hand-to-hand conflict. A hundred men leap over the rail upon the enemy's vessel. The smoke and powder hide them from view. An awful moment of suspense, and then through the haze and fire can be seen John Mayrant clinging to the rattlins with the surrendered English flag in his hand. Captain Pearson has surrendered, and as he hands his sword to Paul Jones, John Mayrant sinks to the deck. Human endurance could stand no more. He was covered with wounds and glory.

That Paul Jones was in the secret of John's valor and bravery is indicated in the letter he sent to Mistress Dorothy Hall recommending the man to her favor in words of highest praise. How well she obeyed the commander's orders is shown on John's return.

THE TALE OF TWO COATS. There is a "kid" extremely slender and very regular boy, a dutiful citizen who expects to meet the governor of the State at a dinner and who sends a messenger boy in a great hurry with instructions to take his suitcase containing his dress suit to the hotel which is the scene of the banquet. There is a fat, jolly and very flowery looking clerk in the aforesaid tall citizen's office who says he wants to get his own dress suit checked to a suburban home for an evening party by means of the same boy and thus wangles cost to himself. The boy is a typical messenger "kid," as crafty and mercenary as he is reckless and utterly lacking as a respecter of persons. The clerk has no trouble in inducing him to perform the double errand as soon as he makes it plain that there is "some chump jo" the job.

The two suitcases happen to be identical in appearance, though the contents are a long way from

THE OTHER JOHNSON. Henry Johnson, a young broker, and his wife are at breakfast one morning when Mrs. Johnson reads the following item concerning her husband in the morning's paper:

> Search is being made for the son of Henry Johnson, who lived in this city twenty years ago and was killed in cold blood, according to one version, during a quarrel. It is reported that Henry Johnson, the well-known young broker, is the missing boy and we will devote two weeks' space to bring the story to light.

With a shriek Mrs. Johnson swoons the coffee to get revenge but is brought around and assures her that he is not the boy he is supposed to.

Young Johnson goes to his office and finds a letter from a San Francisco lawyer, telling him that he is the man and that the reward will be paid over to him at the usual place of appointment.

Henry is elated and calls up his wife to tell her to congratulate him for the good news. He hangs up the receiver and is about to put on his hat when a friend who is engaged in a business deal with the customary glass of wine calls. The two men drink and Henry, thinking some time will elapse before the reward is paid, invites his friend to lunch. During lunch Henry gets into very deep water and promises to see the bank for more.

Suddenly the door opens and in walks a man with a grip and all sorts of baggage, and, setting down his grip, extends his hand to Henry Johnson, the astonished man in the room, and introduces himself as Henry Johnson, the long-lost boy. It seems that a wealthy person in San Francisco died and left a large fortune to the "lost."

While Henry leaves for home to tell his wife the good news the strange boy proceeds to make himself at home in the house, each having brought their grips, prepared to pay Cousin Henry a "real, long visit."

Henry is in despair and, after trying vainly to get them out of the house, decides that he and his wife will slip out and leave their guests to entertain themselves.

But this move is interrupted by a messenger boy with a telegram from San Francisco. It is from Bings & Bangs, attorneys, and reads:

Dear Sir We regret to inform you that you are not the right Johnson.

Mrs. Johnson, happy that it is all over, reads the message to the crowd, and they skulk out, telling Henry what they think of him.

A DARLING CONFUSION. Mr. and Mrs. Jones, a young married couple, have just left breakfast. Mr. Jones seats himself at the desk in the library, quickly takes up a pen, and is about to write, when Mrs. Jones returns and asks him to have a look at her new hat. He is indifferent, looks about and nods his approval, then continues with his writing.

Mrs. Jones, impatient at his indifference, crosses over to see what he is so absorbed in, and receives a shock when she reads the following:

Dear Darling: Meet me in the reception room of Marten's Cafe at 12 o'clock and, while at luncheon, we will talk over our little affairs. GEORGE.

Mrs. Jones is shocked, but does not let her husband know that she had read the note. When he leaves she flies into a rage, which is interrupted when she receives a note from her brother Tom and oddly coincidental, asking her to meet him at the reception rom at Marten's at 12 o'clock.

At the appointed time the enraged little Mrs. Jones is seated in the swell reception room of the cafe named in the notes. A moment later a prettily dressed woman, apparently agitated over something, enters, glances at the clock and compares it with her watch. Mrs. Jones quickly assumes that this is "Darling," and without a word of warning flies at her, grabbing her by the hair and endeavoring frantically to pummel her.

The scene is interrupted by the entrance of a hotel servant, who separates them. The servant is followed by Tom, Mrs. Jones' brother, to whom she explains that "this creature" had made an appointment with her husband. Tom endeavors to console her, when Jones enters and, mistaking the situation, pounces on Tom and his supposed flirtatious wife.

Another fight is about to start, when Darling enters and separates them. For "Darling" is a business gentleman with whom Jones is trying to make a deal.

Things are explained, and the frightened victim of the attack receives from Mrs. Jones the latter's abject and tearful apologies.

THE UNKNOWN CLAIM.—Reuben Ellis and his daughter, Belle, are in hard financial straits. Burdened with debts and pressed by persistent creditors, the old man finds but one way to meet his obligations, and that is mortgaging the ranch. Belle tries to console him, but agrees that they must borrow money.

Ellis rides into town and applies to a money-lender for a sum sufficient to meet his debts. Walker, the loan agent, agrees to ride out to the ranch and look it over, but after he has viewed the ramshackle buildings and pitiful collection of household furniture he shakes his head and says the place is not worth a cent.

Now it happens that one of Ellis' employes, who has been in love with Belle, in wandering over the ranch, discovers an unknown claim, which bears evidence of a good pay streak. He is excitedly making an inspection when he hears voices, and then hides behind a rock as Walker and Ellis come into view. Walker is giving his final verdict, offering a trivial sum for the property. The old man shakes his head and turns away.

Walker is about to go, when the ranch-hand stops him and shows him the rich ore deposits of the unknown claim. Walker appreciates the value of the mine and resolves to accept the mortgage from Ellis and, if possible, to secure the ranch property. Cautioning the ranch-hand to be silent, he again interviews Ellis and offers him money on the ranch property.

The next day an assayer, accompanying Walker and the ranch-hand, make investigations at the mine. After this the assayer leaves them and, in passing Ellis' ranch house, stops to get a drink.

Belle brings him the drink and lingers near him shyly as he questions her. It is a case of mutual infatuation, but young Bartwell, the assayer, makes his departure without making further advances.

A year goes by and Ellis, who is still deeply in debt, receives a letter from Walker advising him that the mortgage will fall due that day and unless it is paid he will immediately foreclose. Ellis is in despair, when Belle resolves to go to the money-lender and intercede with him.

As she leaves the house she is confronted by young Bartwell, smiling pleasantly at her. He has something important to tell her, he says, and asks her to go for a walk with him. By a lucky accident they pass the mine which Bartwell has assayed the year before and he makes mention of the fact, wondering that it has not been developed. The girl looks surprised and tells him that the property belongs to her father. Then she goes on to explain about the mortgage and how it is likely to be foreclosed at noon that day.

Bartwell sees through the whole wicked scheme. He looks at his watch and finds it is after 10. Two hours to make a twelve-mile ride!

Bartwell presses a roll of bills into her hand and, helping her into his saddle, tells her to ride like the wind. The ride which follows is thrilling and shows most remarkable horsemanship.

At ten minutes to 12 she springs from the saddle in front of Walker's office and enters. One of the rogues, hearing her coming, has attempted to set the clock up ten minutes, but she sees the trick and makes him turn the hand back. Then she offers the money and demands the mortgage. It is turned over to her and she goes out.

At the ranch house a few hours later the girl enters breathlessly after her long ride and flourishes the mortgage. The old man tears it up, and Bartwell, who has waited for this opportunity, confesses his love to the girl and is accepted.

ATTACKED BY ARAPAHOES is another historic story of the perils of the Santa Fe trail. A party of gold-seekers start out for the Black Hills, led by a famous scout and well equipped for the journey. They hope for a safe journey, but are soon discovered by a marauding band of Arapahoes, who are called "the meanest Indians that roam the plains." These Arapahoes have sent out a scout in advance, and he sees the gold seekers and carries back the news to his camp. A war party is soon organized, and we see them making their way over the rough country to the point where the wagon train has to pass a narrow passage leading to the foothills. Here the gold-seekers stop for a meal, and while they are unprepared the Indians attack them fiercely. The whites have barely time to get their guns, and most of them are shot in the first rush. The Indians capture a young lad, with his mother, and take them to their camp. Here the boy manages to escape and gets word to Captain Sumner's Indian fighters. Captain Sumner's troop of cavalry starts out at once and after a hot pursuit catches up with the Arapahoes, and as hot a battle ensues as has ever been shown in motion pictures.

The reunion of the mother and daughter with the young son forms the climax of the story.

THE HERO ENGINEER.—The first scene finds the engineer in his home surrounded by his happy family. He is departing for his task of guiding the overland "flyer" with its precious freight across the continent. A few days later a delegation from the railroad engineers' union find that their demands for an increase are peremptorily refused by the superintendent, and a strike is declared.

The next day, as the idle engineers are standing around the deserted roundhouse, the superintendent approaches and begs and implores one of them to carry him to a distant town, where his little one lies dangerous ill. Engineer Thomas, unable to refuse the appeal of the suffering father, takes out the engine amidst the curses and cries of a "scab." We see them rushing through the crowds of desperate strikers that line the tracks and on out into the quiet country. Arriving at his home station, the superintendent learns that his child is out of danger and sets out on the return trip. Meanwhile a friendly call-boy has overheard the plot of the strikers to burn up the trestle over which the superintendent and Engineer Thomas must run. He informs the wife and summons the aid of the militia, who hastily mount a handcar and go speeding toward the trestle. The heroic wife follows the strikers even to the dizzy top of the trestle. From their position in the cab of the flying engine the engineer and superintendent with horrified eyes see the strikers applying their torches to the kindling wood. Unable to stop the engine in time, Engineer Thomas throws on full speed, and as he dashes through the rolling smoke and scorching flames he catches sight of his daring wife, who is endeavoring to stop the strikers in their dastardly work. Quickly bringing the engine to a stop, the engineer and superintendent rush back to the aid of the wife, now in the hands of the infuriated mob. They themselves are quickly overpowered, when, just in the nick of time, the militia arrive. Soon the strikers are fleeing, and Engineer Thomas lifts his now fainting wife into his arms, while the superintendent holds a prisoner, the desperate agitator who urged on the mob of strikers.

THE CLINK OF GOLD.—Mr. Goodman gives all his money to his daughter when she marries. She and her husband do not display any gratitude, and the poor fellow has a dreadful time, receiving from the married couple very little attention. Acting upon the advice of his friend, he obtains a bag filled with small pieces of metal, which, as they are shaken, sound like coins. One day, when he knows the ungrateful children are looking, Mr. Goodman puts this bag away in the strong box of his room. His daughter and her husband think he has come into some more money, and their behavior toward him is very different. When the old man dies, however, and his will is read, they are very much disgusted to find the contents of the casket left to them in the will contains only a stone.

LIFE IN SENEGAL AFRICA.—We are shown the various tradesmen and manufacturers at work on their rather crude products in leather, metal, wood and fabrics.

The street scenes are all filled with activities of unusual kinds.

Our last call at a public place is the schoolhouse, where we see the little black boys hard at work on their studies.

THE INVINCIBLE SWORD.—The story starts with the suit of the Count Ganelon being refused by Angelica, Queen of Cathray, who loves the Knight Roland. Roland, however, has been told by a soothsayer that as long as he keeps his heart true his sword will be invincible. But fate is against him, and he falls in love with Angelica, which he finds disguised as a shepherdess. Ganelon interrupts them, and challenges Roland to fight. Ganelon treats with the enemy respecting giving them plans of the interiors of his arms, but is found out by the shepherd who informs Roland. Roland accepts the Count's challenge, and in the duel he overcomes his adversary, but in the battle which is fought afterward the fortune teller's prophecy is fulfilled for Roland's army is defeated and he himself mortally wounded. He expires blowing his trumpet for the assistance which arrives too late. A splendid dramatic film, and powerfully told.

RUINS OF MEDIAEVAL FORTIFICATIONS IN FRANCE.—Agnes Mattes. A very fine picture of the town from which King St. Louis of France started the Crusades. The ramparts of the old city and views of the river running through are shown, and toward the end of the picture the glories of a sunset are depicted. It is a scenic of good interest, not being too long.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

A RUSSIAN SPY.—General calls an officer and sends him out to get information of enemy's position. Moonlight reconnoiter of scout, foot, hearing enemy, dismounts and proceeds on foot. Falls into an ambush, is captured and taken before an officers' council at a country inn, and imprisoned in cellar.

Maid servant, who has recognized an old friend, goes to the cellar and schemes for his escape.

After holding revelry (introducing a fine Russian dance), the officers leave a sentry on guard at entrance of cellar. Escape of the captive and return of officers, who question sentry, and on hearing explanation send for the girl, who is condemned to death.

Heroine taken into the woods to be shot, when, by the timely arrival of the friendly force, she is saved.

TROPICAL JAVA OF THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.—A particularly interesting travel picture, dealing principally with home life and customs, street scenes in Sourabaia, every kind of vehicle imaginable is shown.

Everyday scenes—a washing day, girls drawing water and indulging in a refreshing shower bath, embroidering, dancing, playing cards in the shade of huge-leaved ferns.

The military school, native boys drilling, an extraordinary goose step, at their studies.

HIS CHILD'S CAPTIVE.—Lawrence Redmond, a prosperous banker, has settled down to a life of domesticity and has almost entirely forgotten the wild-oats days, when, like an echo from the past, comes a note from Eva Landon, an actress, who is passing through the city, and demands that her old friend visit her. Eva's influence was strong in the old days, and Redmond's first impulse is to go to her, even though he had promised to take his wife to the theater, but he fights down the impulse and resolves not to see the woman who once commanded his life. But the actress is not to be denied. Redmond is wealthy and her physical attractiveness, still marked, is rapidly fading. She plans that his money shall make secure the comfort of her declining years. She seeks him out at his office, and Redmond again yields to the magnetism of her presence. His brief visit to her hotel is prolonged through dinner until she is again in complete ascendency, and he promises to elope with her. He returns to the house late at night for important papers, and his little son, nicknamed Redskin, unable to stay in bed with a fascinating Indian suit alongside, captures him and restores him to his forgiving wife and the happy home.

FERDIE'S VACATION.—Ferdie labors in an office, and he thinks of the joys of the country, where his sweetheart is spending the Summer. It's hot in the office; there is a rush of business, and Ferdie seeks release. He has drawn a late vacation in the office pool, and he feels that if he does not get out of town sooner he will never live to enjoy the last two weeks of August. He writes his fiancee asking that a wire be sent him summoning him to the bedside of his dying sister. This is done, and Ferdie exultantly exits from the office, wholly underserving the sympathy which follows him. He is having a corking good time, when a wire comes from the boss that he is stopping off to see Ferdie—and the sick sister—and Ferdie

The Hall-Room Boys

In presenting the emperor of silent comedy, Mr. Fred Walton, in the above picture story, the acme of film comedy has been reached and no better vehicle than "The Hall-Room Boys" could have been secured for his advent into picturedom.

They are seen to enter the boarding-house previous to preparing to attend the mask ball at the Union Club. Donned in their best they take a taxi to the fountain of merriment. The formality of having the proper tickets of admission causes them no end of trouble—but being thrown out of a public place fails to efface the redoubtable pair, and they pass an evening full of surprises and a few bumps—even if they were stung by the fair charmer—so, as the excitement draws to a close, they repair to their apartments, and dream of the eventful night. The morning after brings a fresh supply of trouble—they are informed their places at the ribbon counter have been filled—completing one of the best comedies ever offered in moving photography.

But his daughter discovers the sick sister sitting up with one of her father's cigars and the bottle of whiskey. THE GOLDEN SECRET.—A Navajo Indian has crossed the great desert, and his water bottle has been emptied. He is in a frenzy from thirst and sees mirages of water everywhere. He comes upon Nat Perry, a young settler, who is conveying his household goods across the burning sands. Perry has just taken a drink from his precious canteen when the Indian falls at his feet and implores a little water. The young pioneer heartlessly turns him over with his foot and leaves him to die.

Kate and Will Brown are passing in a prairie "schooner." They see the Indian's plight and revive him, load him into their vehicle and proceed on their journey. Two years later the Indian is a valued friend and servant, when he has an altercation with Perry over the latter's conduct in the desert and is fatally wounded. He crawls to his employer's home and dies, but before he passes to the great beyond he tells the young settlers the secret of a lost gold mine and gives them a rude map which will help them to find it. Perry has overheard this conversation, and, while he has not seen the map, he resolves to follow Kate and Will when they start on their search.

The Indian is decently buried, and the search begins. By rude drawings and familiar landmarks the mine is finally discovered. Brown immediately sees its great value, and in his haste to communicate their good fortune to his wife he turns his ankle on a stone and sinks to the ground under the pain.

While Kate is binding up the injured member, Perry, who has folowed them closely, appears and commands them to throw up their hands. They are taken completely by surprise, relieved of their revolvers, their horses driven down the side of the mountain and Perry writes a location claim and rides away to file it at the nearest land office for himself.

Kate is in despair at the sudden change in their fortune, but conceives a plan intended to outwit the villainous Perry. She knows that he must ride a long way around and around the mountain in his descent, while if she can succeed in climbing down the side of a steep cliff she can be ahead of him. The difficulty is to find a horse, but she suddenly sees, far below her, a rider. His attention is attracted by means of huge stones, which she throws down. He sees her and stops, and is astonished when the plucky girl swings far out from the top of the cliff on a stout lariat and climbs hand over hand down the mountain. Her story is quickly told, and the gallant cowboy leads his horse.

Then begins a race for the land office, in which the plucky girl is the victor. Perry arrives shortly after her, and is arrested by the sheriff, who happens to be there. The richness of her nugget excites the interest of an Eastern capitalist, and an option is sold on the mine, which insures the young couple a handsome competence and luxury for life.

PATHE FRERES.

THE RUNAWAY DOG.—Jones has arranged to go shooting, and just as he is ready to start he receives a note from a friend, who had promised him the loan of his dog, that the animal was sick. Not to be done out of his enjoyment, Jones decides to purchase a dog. After various attempts to do so, he succeeds in coming to terms with a tramp. No sooner, however, had he led the dog a little way on his road before he yearns for his old master, and with a sudden dash flies off at a headlong pace, the unfortunate sportsman being dragged along in his wake. Down goes a cyclist, then a big, fat country girl with a basket, and an Italian statue dealer suffers in a like way. Next a dozen customers outside a saloon are dispersed in different directions, and immediately a man painting the wall of a house is overturned. At last Jones makes a grab for a lamppost in a desperate effort to stop his and the dog's headlong flight. It is a more effective method than he imagined, for the excited animal, dancing round him on his leash, binds him securely to the post. Subsequently he is released by his victims, who belabor him unmercifully, whilst the dog scampers back to the tramp.

THE RHINE FROM COLOGNE TO BINGEN.—This film takes you past all the most famous castles, each of which is the subject of hundreds of legends. First, we see Koenigswinter and the crumbling ruins of the Dragon's Rock. In quick succession follow Linz, Anderach and the Fortress of Ehren-breitstein. Next comes one of the most famous sights of the Rhine, the monument of Emperor William. And then the Lorelei, the Oberweisel, and the ruins of Schonburg, and, passing through the Rhine Palatine, we come upon Kaub and the Castle of Gutenfels. Amongst others we see the famous Rheinstein and Sonneck castles, and, finally, at Bingen itself, the Mouse, or Hatto's, Tower, and the vineyards of Rudesheim.

This film is pregnant with interest, giving a true representation of the splendid scenery of this magnificent and incomparable river, and calling to mind the innumerable tales and myths of quaint old German folklore, which spreads its misty veil upon the dark and mysterious waters.

LOVE YE ONE ANOTHER.—A poor, half-starved wayfarer asks several of the villagers for help or work without avail. No one will give him food or even a kindly word. Even a lad eating bread on the porch of his home refuses him a morsel. Bitter and despairing, this poor sufferer ultimately finds himself before one of those gigantic crosses which uplift themselves so conspicuously above the Normandy landscape. Disgusted with human nature, he raises his stick and reviles the figure of Christ upon the Cross. At the same moment a laborer appears coming down the road, and the outcast feels impelled to fall upon him and strike him. He holds himself in readiness, watching the countryman slowly approaching, and then with uplifted stick springs forward, but in place of the laborer stands the figure of Christ, who leads him back to the foot of the Cross and points out the words carved on the base, "Love Ye One Another." The stick falls, hate and curses give way to sobs, and the wayfarer, reading, understands and continues on his way. Suddenly the alarm bell rings out. He turns and sees one of the farmhouses in flames. The youth who had refused him bread is helpless in the upper part and the villagers are running to and fro distracted. A ladder is raised, and with sudden strength the tramp goes up, and, through choking smoke and falling rafters, snatches the lad in his arms and takes him down to safety. Reaching the ground, he falls, and rough hands are now eager to lend him assistance. Alas! it is too late, he has given all he had to give, his own poor, wretched life, to a fellow-creature.

JINKS HAS THE SHOOTING MANIA.—Tommy's father gives him a popgun for a present, and in showing him how to use it finds out that he can hit the bull's-eye every time. This so excites dad that he gets a mania for shooting. He goes out and purchases a rifle. And now the fun commences. Anything he sees he practices his skill on. Various articles are destroyed, and innumerable are the brawls he finds himself mixed up in. In one case he aims at a parasol on the grass that looks like a target, behind which a soldier and his sweetheart are making love. It is fortunate the film does not show the language that soldier used. Finally he aims at the bunghole of some barrels of beer being delivered to a saloon. His aim, as usual, is sure, and the beer gushes forth in a stream into the street. This time, however, it is his finish, and he himself becomes the target for an avalanche of fruit, eggs, potatoes and turnips that his various victims find real pleasure in throwing at his defenseless head.

BIG-HEARTED MARY.—Mary is the daughter of a rich farmer and her friend Helen is the daugter of a poor farmhand out of a job. Mary, calling for her friend one morning on her way to school, learns of their great distress, and, returning to her parents, suggests that some assistance be given to them. Unfortunately, the farmer learns that Helen is the child of a man with whom he had quarreled in the past, and refuses to hear another word on their behalf. Poor little Mary is downhearted, but makes up her mind that something must be done to relieve the distress of Helen and her parents. She accordingly takes from her home a rabbit and some eggs, which she gives to them in her father's name, so that they have no scruples about accepting the present. The theft is, however, soon discovered, and a farmhand supposed to be the culprit is dismissed. Mary is then in a fix, and she decides to confess her guilt. Her father, startled at the development, investigates the matter, and, rather ashamed of his harsh treatment of Helen, not only forgives his own little girl, but finds work for Helen's father and mother on his farm.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT REVIEWING THE FRENCH TROOPS.—This short, topical picture is of great interest at the present moment, inasmuch as it gives a very good picture of the ex-President in conversation with the French commander facing the camera and right close up to it.

THE CHAMPION OF THE RACE.—There is many a marriage arranged for a young girl by her parents for financial or social advancement, but it is not often that she is as resourceful as Helen Brown in devising a method that enables her to marry the man of her heart with her parent's consent.

George Brown and John Gordon were leading bankers in Longville, and in order to benefit their banks they had arranged that Helen Brown should marry James Gordon, and the film opens with a reception given in honor of the engagement. Helen was, however, secretly betrothed to a young officer, Harry Castleroy, and at the reception refused to have anything to do with James and spent as much time as possible with her soldier lover. Brown is an ardent automobilist and has set his whole heart on winning the twenty-four hour endurance race, and, the subject cropping up at the reception, backs himself for $20,000 to win the race. Brown makes his preparations, and on the day of the race arriving it rends cats[illegible] it does not start until 6 o'clock. In case he takes his future son-in-law fishing in the yacht. Helen now sees a desperate chance to win her father's consent. She sends for Harry and explains her plan. Quietly they put to sea in a boat, moors the fisherman's boat and leaves them to drift at the mercy of the sea with a blanket over them, donning their motoring clothes. Helen and Harry speed to the track. The time for the race to start has arrived, but Brown has not put in an appearance, and the race is about to start without him and he will lose his bet. But Helen jumps into the automobile, goes to the starting point and drives it in the race. We see her and her companion tearing round the track at over [illegible] miles an hour. Meantime Brown and James have drifted out to sea and next afternoon are discovered exposed and with the greatest difficulty are rescued up by a passing yacht. Safe on land but soaking and exhausted, they hurry to the track in time to see the finish of the race. Protesting against his misfortune, Brown is amazed to see that his daughter is the winning driver, and that she has been with his entry. As a return for her saving work he is let and the trophy he so much desires with little persuasion he consents to her marriage to the young officer, much to the disappointment of the unfortunate James.

The saving of the two men was only accomplished with much trouble, and if it had not been for the extra aid from the boatload we doubt whether James would have survived to take part in another picture, for he had already gone under twice, and was all in.

THE PHOENIX.—On account of bad character, Leslie Blackburn, a gambler was disowned by his father and the fortune willed to his half-sister Sadie. However, Blackburn would not be put off in this way, so he endeavored to do away with Sadie, but, unknown to him, she was rescued by the Salvation Army and grew into womanhood under their care. While engaged in [illegible] work in New York, she was saved from assault by Carroll Graves, who although he led a Bohemian life, was good at heart. He knew Blackburn from out West and had been robbed of a fortune by him through false gambling. He has in his possession legal papers to the effect that Sadie was among the living, and he was now in search of her and Blackburn.

Graves recognized Sadie and, having also located Blackburn, he wrote to him to call at his home, but through cunning Blackburn drugs him and robs him of the papers and kills O'Gill, a friend of Graves, who had come to his rescue. In the scuffle the candle is upset and the house commences to burn, but Sadie saves Graves from an untimely death.

A few years elapse, during which Sadie becomes a great singer, and Blackburn, not knowing who she really is, becomes infatuated with her. On Graves' wish, she makes an appointment with Blackburn, where he is met by Graves and a detective. On presentation of the serious charges against him, he suddenly puts an end to his wretched life.

A BOARDING-SCHOOL ROMANCE.—Disregarding the rules of the seminary the hero of our play penetrates the sacred precinct of the campus to meet his student sweetheart. While they are engaged in innocent courtship the old maid principal indignantly drives the young man from the place and sends the young girl indoors. She seeks her schoolmates tells them with tears in her eyes of the enforcement of the school discipline and the principal's interference with her love affairs. The girls sympathize with her and all declare they will get even with their supervisor.

Another Expose!

Here's something that is even worse than the "$104-in-advance" proposition. By next week the Laemmle Film Service expects to have evidence on hand, proving that the latest move of the trust is to dictate to theatres what admission fee they shall charge, cancelling the licenses of such theatres as may refuse to raise their price from 5 to 10 cents per patron. This, of course, is a thinly veiled scheme to hound certain theatres out of business. Watch for the details. Meanwhile, quit laying yourself open to this persecution. Turn your trade our way and we'll give you the best program of moving pictures in America to-day! Protect your investment! Do it now! Write!

the tell-tale snapshot of the professor and his inamorata.

The young man whom we saw in the first scene calls at the school again to see his sweetheart. The principal sees them talking together and orders the young man from the grounds. He stands immovable, and the principal calls the Latin professor to her assistance. He commands the young chap to be off, but is met with a direct refusal to make himself scarce; then he shows the professor the snapshot of himself making love to the "professoress." The professor is amazed, then sheepishly shows it to his little "Daffy-down-Dilly," who wilts.

The professor of "amo, ami, amat" suggests a compromise by an exchange of the photograph for the privilege of a meeting between the two young sweethearts. The bargain closed, the couples are soon lost in sweet reveries of future happiness and inspiring twangs of Cupid's darts.

BETWEEN LOVE AND HONOR.—Controlled by a passionate temper, the dissipated father dominates his motherless daughter with a tyrannical will and upon every occasion scolds and finds fault. He makes her a drudge and does not hesitate to make her assist him in his occupation as a fisherman. Trudging along with a pair of oars on her shoulder, the father leads the way to his boat and there finds his helper, who is his daughter's lover. The young fellow greets the girl affectionately and the old man shows his disapproval in ugly mood and profane words. He then beckons to his helper to get into the boat and tells his daughter to be gone.

Out upon the sea, the two fishermen are now hauling their net, which comes up empty. The old man is wild with rage when he finds a hole 'n the net, for which defect he vents his wrath upon his young assistant, who resents it and denies that it is his fault. They begin their return to shore, with the older fisherman in ugly mood. When they reach the shore he renews his abuse, and becomes so enraged he strikes the young man with a stone, felling him. His victim lies motionless upon the sands. The old tyrant concludes he has killed him; in haste to flee the spot, he drops his hat, and when he discovers his loss fears to return for it, and at the same time realizes that his hat, if found, would be incriminating evidence.

Just as the man is gazing upon the prostrate form of the object of his wrath, his daughter has come to the boat landing, and, unseen by her father, sees him strike her lover. She finds her father's hat, and, with loathing is prompted not to touch it, but, her filial duty asserting itself, she places it in the bosom of her dress. Kissing her lover's face, and thinking him dead, she hastens back to her home, where she meets her brutal father, who has tried to drown his thoughts and conscience in drink.

She gives his lost hat to him, and he realizes that she must know of his crime and thinks he will kill her, but throws her from him in a frenzy and rushes from the house. In the meantime some sailors find the young lover on the coast, revive him and lift him into their boat. The father goes direct to the scene of his supposed crime and imagines he sees the form of the lover lying in the water, washed by the tide and partly covered with sand. The father goes insane and wanders over the rocky crags. A storm arises and he dies from exposure.

The daughter, with lantern in hand, starts in search of her father, whose failure to return to his home makes her anxious. She discovers her father's body while making her way over the cliffs and rocks, and, at the same time, her lover, who has been landed by the sailors at a distance from his home, is on his way to the little village, comes upon his sweetheart, who is at first startled at his sudden appearance; but when she sees his head bandaged she knows he was not killed by her father, and throws herself into his arms, and, as they look upon the dead form of her father, the young man asks her to marry him that he may be her protector and provider.

A year or two later we see them in their own cozy little home, blessed with the sunshine of happiness, a pretty little baby and the loving kindness that makes them doubly blest.

BECKET.—Thomas a Becket was born in London. In 1155 he was made Chancellor of England by Henry II. Upon the death of the Archbishop Theobald of Canterbury, in 1162, at the time of this tragedy, he was elected, through King Henry's influence, to the vacant see.

This exceptional film starts with a scene in the palace of King Henry II. showing Henry and Becket playing chess. The game is won by Becket, greatly provoking the King, who becomes angry. While in the midst of this tantrum, a messenger enters and presents Henry with the announcement of the death of the Archbishop Theobald, together with the bishop's cross. Henry is shocked, and, as he looks at the cross, half in jest and a desire to ridicule, he offers the jewel to Becket, and then places the cross with chain attached around Becket's neck, hoping it will prove a yoke to the wearer in his efforts to sustain the dignity and piety of the church, which, of course, he thinks is quite impossible for Becket to do.

In this he is mistaken. Becket feels his unworthiness, but, inspired by the holiness of the office and its great responsibility, he at once, by prayer and castigations, prepares himself for its duties, which he devoutly and reverently accepts. While at devotion in the palace of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Becket is surprised by King Henry and his courtiers, who rudely interrupt him by their cruel and coarse laughter when they see him in his priestly robes in the attitude of humility and abnegation.

Filled with the majesty and divine spirit of his office, and aroused by a righteous indignation, Becket commands Henry and his followers to mend their ways and flee the wrath of God, lest they be destroyed. With cowering glances and slinking tread they leave his presence, shamefaced and abashed. Henry is now at enmity with the clergy. The scenes which follow show the incidents which lead to the attempted assassination of Father Gerard, the King's confessor, for the denunciation of the King's paramour, Rosamond.

Henry, smarting under the opposition of the church, drafts a constitution which makes it possible for the King alone to put to death without court trial any member of the clergy whom he may accuse. This sounds the death knell of Becket, against whom the King bears great enmity. The archbishop realizes his position, and his fears are soon brought to a reality. He is pursued by the minions of the King, who proceed to the Cathedral of Canterbury and slay him while he kneels at prayer before the crozier.

The murderers carry the news to the King, apprising him of the execution of his dictate. He and his court tremble as they appreciate the enormity of their crime against the head of the church. Scarcely do they recover their nerve when retribution follows the King in the announcement that his own sons have seized the Kingdom of France; the Scots have crossed the border, and general uprisings in the midland. Crushed and half-crazed, Henry falls, a tottering wreck, against the throne, while the vision of the murdered Archbishop Becket, in beatific attitude, appears before him. The King, with conscience aflame with fear and remorse, collapses, a helpless and wretched mass, while the vision fades away.

NELLIE'S FARM.—Thousands shut in by brick and mortar, forming impregnable walls that shut out the fresh air and bright sunshine, long and wilt for nature's breezes and hunger for a view of its refreshing scenes.

In the midst of such environments little Dick and poor little crippled Nell dwell and dream of the country, of which they have so often heard, but have never seen. The "Fresh Air Fund" has given to these poor children an invitation to go on one of these excursions. It is impossible for Nell, sick and lame, to go. Dick, however, accepts, and starts, full of anticipation and life, to live for two weeks in green fields with a good, whole-souled farmer, who has chosen Dick as his guest.

While Nell is confined to her bed, racked with pain, surrounded by the tiresome monotony of poverty and lack of home comforts, left alone while her hard-working mother has gone to deliver the day's washing, little Dick is seen in the country, busy on the farm of the kind old friend, who is showing Dick how to milk, hunt eggs, and learning the things which seem like wonderland to the poor boy. We see Dick in other scenes—in the fields, plucking flowers and drinking in the invigorating breath of nature.

While buoyant and happy in these new-found joys, Dick has not forgotten his little sick friend, Nellie. He is planning and arranging to take some of the country to her, digging bits of grass and plants to take back to the city so she can share in his joys and pleasures. The day for the little man's return to the fetid city tenement has arrived, and Dick begins to pack his scant belongings. The old farmer brings him some apples, eggs and two little chickens for Nellie. These, with the grasses and ferns, Dick bundles up, and now he is on his way to the special car which is to carry him back home.

A SOLDIER'S SACRIFICE.—As he bade his young wife good-bye and rode away to join his company, Sergeant Hale's heart was stout and brave, and little did he dream that in six short months he was to be a deserter—yet such he proved.

It was just before their camp was attacked that Sergeant Kelly had handed Hale a note. His wife was dying and implored him to obtain leave of absence and come, for her and their baby's sake.

Sorrowfully Col. Bennett shook his head at a soldier's duty; but when duty began upon the head of action. The young Sergeant withdrew. Then the camp was attacked, and as Hale mounted his horse the wild desire to see his wife grew too strong. After all, he would but be numbered among the dead or missing and might at any time return, so with a quick glance around, he headed his horse for the road.

All might have gone as he had planned and Capt. Gardner, not to be outdone as to Sergeant, dashed down the road and straightway ordered the deserter captured, dead or alive.

Hale's wife had just died in his arms, after giving their baby to Mrs. Bennett, to adopt, when fateful Aunt Liza gave the alarm that the soldiers were upon them. Her mistily poised remarks on the uneven stove chimney, were to would shortly have been discovered, had not his old friend Sergeant Kelly been sent at the head of the capturing party and seeing the dead and the widow's school mate with the tiny baby, sent his men solemnly from the room.

As soon as all was again quiet Aunt Liza persuaded the good Sergeant's husband to permit the horse to run, scurried at the woods and rode good his escape.

Eighteen years passed. Hale now a broken hearted man, watched at the door of the cabin, returned to take a last look at his old home and if possible his little daughter, but little she no longer found Col. Bennett's adopted daughter—but such a perfect picture of her mother that to mistake her would have been impossible.

For one mad moment he contemplated revealing his identity to Louise, then sanity returned. To what purpose. To bring shame and sorrow upon the girl? Never! With a mighty effort the old soldier squared his shoulders and with a reverent salute to his Colonel passed on, and later wore out with lack of food and exposure, smilingly as in a dream, he heeded his old comrades of Company "B" as passed still onward toward the great Unknown. Sergeant Hale had answered his last roll-call!

ONE MAN'S CONFESSION.—The little village of Rosedale was celebrating a great event. The gossips gathered at the street corners, wondering who he was, where he came from, and what he had come for. The object of the excitement was a sick young stranger who had engaged the star bedroom of the only hotel the village boasted, and who had come to him out of the way place, so the doctor told them, to die. The doctor himself was puzzled over the case, as the man had no physical illness, and he finally came to the conclusion that his patient was a moral suicide.

On the night the young man died, the nurse being asleep at the foot of the bed, he had strange hallucinations. This one man lived again, in his own confession, all the terrible scenes in his life that had brought him to his present condition. Living again his life, he passed through the days with his sweetheart, his friend, and his mother.

The sleeping nurse in the chair at the foot of the bed seemed to change before the eyes of the dying youth to the above mentioned characters in this drama of his life.

In his final paroxysms he awoke the nurse, who, in her fright, called aloud for assistance, but when the doctor and the landlord and other inmates of the hotel reached the room the young man had gone to be judged for his sins.

LUX FILMS.

THE MONEY LENDER'S SON.—The scenes are laid around the beautiful mansion of Horace Douglas, a headstrong but affectionate husband and father, who has just found that he is financially overwhelmed. In vain he pleads with the old money lender, and in despair takes his life, leaving his wife and only daughter to bear the brunt of it all. The heartless old man turns them by force from their old home and without shelter. The young girl leads her mother to a secluded part and among some old ruins makes her as comfortable as possible. Setting off to gather some sticks to make a fire, she comes across a young man who lies injured. This young man although unknown to her, is the son of the old money lender who has been attacked by highwaymen. Calling the aid of her mother, the two women struggle with their unconscious burden to the shelter, where they attend to his injuries. He becomes enraptured with his young rescuer and confesses his love for her, and leaves them to fetch his father. A MIGHTIER HAND. [illegible] Carter [illegible] Western [illegible] over a quarrel over [illegible] Holmer [illegible] a fight with Carter, who is arrested and taken away by the sheriff.

In a powerful dramatic scene, Homer's widow vows Carter and swears to avenge her husband's death. That night Carter escapes from her sheriff and runs away, taking with him his little son Frank.

Fourteen years pass. Carter has made a fortune in the East under an assumed name. His son Frank, now a fine young man, goes West with a party of friends. While riding horseback, he passes the cottage of the widow Holmer and meets her beautiful daughter May. Frank is thrown from his horse and the girl picks him up and takes him into her house.

The girl's mother enters, and, horrified by the resemblance of the young man to the man whom she believed murdered her husband, orders him from her home. But the young people have fallen in love with each other. They meet, and after a few days elope and go East.

The girl sends a group photograph of herself, her husband and her father-in-law to her mother. The mother recognizes Carter's face, despite his gray hair, and, seizing a revolver, she leaves her home to carry out her oath of vengeance.

The widow enters Carter's home and confronts him with a pistol, exclaiming, "At last! I have you; and I shall kill you as you killed my husband." But before she can raise the pistol to shoot, Carter utters a fearful cry, and falls dead of heart disease.

The son and daughter enter, and a most pathetic scene closes the story.

THE BURGLAR AND THE BABY.—Frank Evans is a bookkeeper, in love with Marion Holmes, and also in love with drink. He loses his job and gives up his sweetheart rather than spoil her life. The girl consoles herself by marrying another man.

Evans goes lower and lower and finally becomes a burglar. He enters a house and has taken a lot of silverware from the sideboard. A man enters. The burglar holds him up with a pistol; but when he finds that the man is carrying a sick baby, the burglar's softer side shows itself, and he helps the father take care of the child.

The wife enters. She looks at the burglar and cries, "Way, Frank!" The burglar turns and recognizes his old sweetheart. Crushed and ashamed, he leaves the house. After a while the burglar returns, places the stolen silver back on the sideboard, and with a regretful sigh he exits through the window.

SALLY'S BEAUX.—Sally is a very pretty girl and a finished little coquette. Bob and Tom, two cowboys, are in love with her. She sets one against the other. A rich tenderfoot enters and she makes up to him.

The two cowboys are about to fight when "Old Man" Smith suggests a scheme. Bob writes Tom a letter challenging him to fight a duel to the death, the survivor to try for the girl. Tom drops the letter in the girl's home. She finds it, and rushes out into the woods. She hears pistol shots, and finds the two cowboys apparently dying on the ground. She starts to go to Bob. Frank groans to attract her attention. She starts to turn to him, and Bob groans. The girl gets frightened and runs away. The two cowboys look at each other and follow, and then they find the girl in the arms of the tenderfoot, who wins her.

THE SONS OF THE MINISTER.—The two sons of the minister are very unlike as brothers. Abel is serious and somber-looking, and is following his father to be a minister. John is a lively, bright fellow, who likes the sea and is a sailor. The old minister, who is much respected in the village, has also an adopted daughter, Cassie, who is very fond of John, but the old father does not approve of his profession, but prefers that of Abel. Very much against her will, therefore, Cassie has to be engaged to the latter, as she does not want to hurt her foster-father's feelings. She cannot resist at times, however, going out with John to the village hall to a dance or other amusement to enjoy herself. When she is out one evening at a dance, John has a quarrel with another fellow. The police are called in, and the matter is reported to the old minister. Abel takes his fiancee away at once, and accuses his brother of being the cause of the quarrel. The old minister settles the affair in the police court, pays the fines, and sends his son John out into the world with a little money, telling him that he must go his own way, and not come back any more. Many years pass. The old father dies. Abel has married Cassie and has taken over his father's position. John in the meantime has travelled around the world in his ship. One day as they are passing along the coast not far from his old home, a terrible storm springs up and they are shipwrecked. Half-drowned and unconscious, John is thrown upon the rocks, and after gaining consciousness he manages to stagger along the well known footpath to his old home. Cassie happens to be alone, and is greatly surprised when she sees the face of her old sweetheart. She gives him nourishing food and drink and hurries him off at once, as she expects her husband home at any minute. John leaves as quickly as possible, and directly after Abel enters the room; but he already knows about the strange visitor [illegible] terrible [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible] Abel [illegible] [illegible] down the hills. [illegible] sight, John climbs down the hill to [illegible] Brother flies, and he excitedly [illegible] [illegible] him home. But it is too late [illegible] last moments Abel realizes [illegible] attack on his brother [illegible] [illegible] brother's [illegible] [illegible] after Cassie [illegible] leaving the other two to work out [illegible] in the world.

OLD HEADS AND YOUNG HEARTS.—A [illegible] like that when one [illegible] pretty and one to keep together [illegible] a [illegible] degree of peace in the family. Two old gentlemen who have been pals from boyhood decide that their children ought to marry. Each considers it a commendable one, to be sure, and what is more, their son and daughter like each other pretty well, still more, the wish of the parents would have been automatically done if the old men only had sense enough to remember the adage about too cooks and the broth. Their continued interference so completely disgusts the couple that [illegible] no reason of ill feeling toward each other they come to the conclusion that they had better elope. Their fathers are panic-stricken when they learn of this and are at their wits' end as to how to repair the damage they now realize they have done. But a friend of theirs arrives and he helps them out of the situation. He so arranges things that the son and daughter come on the scene one day while their parents are apparently having a furious fight. They learn that the two men now object to the marriage of their children, and since they really look as if they have been hanging over each other around, the children follow tradition. Experience has taught the world that a sure way to have young people do your wish is to object to it: they are always contrary. The ruse works. The dads go to the limit in their apparent objections, and the children finally elope and get married. The two wise men then go out for a celebration.

THE SALOON NEXT DOOR.—One of the clumsy mistakes that Harry Worth makes while courting Emily is to go to her father's jewelry store to buy her a ring. Her brother Jack waits on him, and even shakes him heartily by the hand when he learns that he's progressed so far with his sister. But when father enters the store and sees the purchase he places his veto on the idea by putting the ring back in stock and waving his hand. Shakespeare once said something about there being a tide in the affairs of men. Harry's tide comes soon, when the store is broken into one night and robbed. It happened that Emily's brother had to come back after hours in his evening clothes, and now when the police are summoned to the scene of the robbery one of his gloves is found on the floor. No time is lost in getting the suspect under guard, and it seems that everybody loses faith in him but Harry. There is a saloon next door which excites his suspicions, and, feigning drunkenness, he overhears something that looks like a clue. After a series of adventures that require as much tact as nerve, he is finally detected by the gangsters, and when he gets into their power they bind and gag him. But he manages to work himself free enough to reach a phone and upset it sufficiently to talk. In this way he notifies the police, and when they arrive they not only capture the thieves but recover the loot. You can bet that after that Harry doesn't even have to pay for the ring he wanted to buy his girlie!

THE CLERGYMAN AND HIS WARD.—A frightful disaster had occurred at a mine in Northern Pennsylvania. Weeping wives and mothers rent the air with wails of anguish as the mangled forms of their loved were borne to the entrance of the shaft.

Mr. Hutton, the beloved young bachelor minister was quickly on the scene, lending good service to the poor, anguished relatives and friends.

During this sad spectacle a little child with wistful look, stood by while the body of her father was removed with the rest. Alone and friendless, the poor child stood among that harvest of death, forgotten and uncared for—a helpless orphan. But kind Fate in the person of Mr. Hutton came to her and then and there the good man determined that little Helen should be his special charge.

Years rolled on and the girl grew into a comely, gracious woman. A careful observer might have noticed something deeper than a paternal regard for his ward, but the studious minister attended to his manifold duties without disclosing it.

Now it happened that the son of one of his very old friends was a frequent visitor at the parsonage—one John Williams. You may as well try to stem the course of the Atlantic as to try to prevent the beating hearts of two young lovers. Mr. Hutton saw it all, he said nothing, but his soul was pierced by the iron. How he watched this [illegible] is that

Schmidt is a moment. They mount their horses, brandish his rifle, Tempest at the head they are off in pursuit of the culprits. The scene now changes. The girl is trying to get her parents food and supplies. It is like a thunderbolt from heaven when the Mexicans shout, "Throw up your hands." The desperate Mexicans is about to draw his gun and shoot at Lewis, but the kid is too quick to him and speeds his gun out of the Mexican's hand. Single handed Joe the young lad overcomes the bandit and surrounded Mexicans. Suddenly at a distance is heard the command, "Little Friends." The head is seen approaching at daring speed with his cowboys. They lasso both Mexicans and drag them from the scene. Peace is soon restored to the camp and the cheers and congratulations showered upon the two young lads will make your heart feel good. After all are so much enthused that you would like to go over to the boys and, slapping them on the shoulder say "Congratulate you, boys for your bravery." This picture pleases by showing Lewis and Pemph with their mammoth Teddy bear which was presented to them by Col. Theodore Roosevelt's Rough Riders at their reception.

PATHE NOTES.

Exhibitors both [illegible] are receiving [illegible] the work of [illegible] the [illegible] of this world of [illegible] words spoken [illegible] Pathe Freres have [illegible] six [illegible] which are really comedies [illegible] Lucky Will" and on July 27 "Stop Us If You Can." On July 1 "Rebellious Betty" and on July 2 "Max Loses the Police." On July 4 the "Runaway Dog" and on July 6 "Jinks Has to Scouting Mama." And on July 9, "The Champion of the Race." Pathe Freres are in a position to give us these comedies because they have two of the world's greatest moving picture comedians working for them at the present time—Max Linder and Betty in addition to various other comedians not so well known. It is certainly a matter of congratulation when one film produces laughs consecutive weeks and all will hope that they continue the good work. "The Champion of the Race" was produced in this country and is the best of the Pathe American productions to contain an incident. Judging from the way this picture is staged it is evident that they intend to use over into the same thing in detail and technique that has made their films famous the world over.

LUBIN NOTES.

"The Highlanders" is a Lubin release out of the ordinary, dealing as it does with Chinatown and its hatchet men. It forms a part of the release for July 14 and is one of the most spirited pictures shown lately. In spite of the title it is not one of those films that smack drip gore, but is cared fully handled to offer dramatic interest without repellant suggestion. One of the hatchet men of a powerful Tong plots the destruction of the mission minister who has discovered him to an attempted murder, but the plans are frustrated by a brave little teacher in the Lasson who gives the minister warning and brings the police to his aid. The story will be released on the red wire a Lubin comedy—"The Almighty Dollar."

"The Adopted Daughter" is the release for July 14. It is a story of New Mexico ranch life along unusual lines, and is notable for its photography.

The novel water curtain has been put in operation at the new Lubin studio and the rapid evaporation of the film of water flowing over the glass keeps the studio building wonderfully cool these warm days. It is something new in principle and only one of the many new devices planned for this perfect plant designed to either aid the production of the best work or conduce to the comfort of the operatives.

The star scenario read last week by the editorial department of the Lubin Company began the action on earth, removed the principal characters to Heaven, took the hero to the inferno and then back to earth, where his angel sweetheart was permitted to join him. This beats the minister who wanted pictures of Hell made to fit phonographic records of the cries of the damned.

Several important additions to the Lubin Stock Company were made the past week, many of the players being well known to the average theatergoer.

Other meritorious engagements are now in process of negotiation and some splendid plays are being plotted for the new company. All of the old favorites have been retained, the company being augmented to provide players to another director.

The stress laid upon the educational value of motion pictures is having the odd effect in that everyone astride a hobby enters it into the scenario departments of the various concerns. In the last month the Lubin Company has been asked to produce a score of scenarios from the suffragette movement and treating as a proposition to sell to a Western city several hundred acres of land to be made into a park. The latter scheme was well disguised but experts have learned to be suspicious.

One of the pending Lubin releases is the work of a Western author who stands in the first rank and who marketed his story under a name other than his well known pen name. For the present he elects not to be known in connection with his pictures until after all of the tenseness and variety of his magazine contributions. Authors of standing are commencing to perceive the value of the picture play as an adjunct to their more extended writings.

A Canadian exhibitor with the other day in regard to a business matter and added: "'Veteran of the G. A. R.' is a great story. I thought I could recognize the Lubin players in any disguise but here I am no guessing. Are they the regulars or some real veterans you hired for the picture?" The makeups in the G. A. R. scene were remarkable but they were all worn by regular members of the company.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company is preparing a series of pictures that will be record makers so far as it is possible to perfect the details. The machinery of the new studio enables the presentation of many effects not possible in the former limited quarters and now the interior scenes will have all of the fine photographic qualities of the present exterior scenes.

The Lubin stock company is to be still further enlarged and a fourth company formed to act as reserve for the other three divisions. This will permit the directors to vary their casts without interfering with the players engaged in other pictures.

One of the recent submissions to the Lubin Scenario Department told the story of a man who discovered the infidelity of his wife. Calmly suddenly upon the guilty pair he held them at the point of a gun, summoned he telephoned for a minister and witnesses and forced the lover to marry the unfaithful wife without taking the trouble to divorce her. The story was not intended as a joke. Another script at last week's mail was "A Millionaire's Adventure" originally proposed to the Lubin Company and rejected without a chance of scene or title. Some literary thieves possess more nerve than intelligence.

Plans have been prepared for the parking of the grounds of the new plant of the Lubin Manufacturing Co. [illegible] work will be begun at once. Cement walks and a twelve-foot driveway will cut the grass plots and ornamental lamps will add to the appearance of the grounds as well as supply a complete illumination. Unusual care has been given to the lighting of the new plant apart from the special studio lights, glow lamps of a new pattern being employed throughout.

One of the recent additions to the decorations of the Lubin offices is a bill in Chinese, extolling the merits [illegible] of the Lubin films exhibited in Australia by the West enterprises. Wise ads in French, German, Russian, Italian and Spanish, the collection [illegible]

EDISON NOTES.

[illegible]

[illegible] Natharial Hawthorne's great [illegible] The House of Seven Gables," [illegible] the Edison Company [illegible] Hawthorne's [illegible] the most dramatic and [illegible] poets while at [illegible] Further details [illegible]

By special arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway [illegible] the Edison Studio left New York City June 22 for Montreal, [illegible] used by special train to Vancouver, B. C., taking pictures en route. The value of these pictures from a dramatic scene and topographical standpoint can hardly be overestimated.

A most up-to-date plot, in which the quickest and most modern of [illegible] the methods of communications, the wireless, is employed is one of the distinguishing features of "A Wireless Romance," the release of July 8. Another feature is the wonderful photography, which is easily understood when it is explained that the picture is one of the pictures recently produced in Cuba, and still another feature, novel and interesting is a duelling race at high speed between a yacht and a racing [illegible]. This is an absorbing story with a very strong dramatic situation, rendered all the more interesting by the element of novelty that surrounds the theme.

Rex Beach's "Out of the Night," released July 12 is a story of a young man's heroism, love and self-sacrifice and a woman's loyalty and devotion with a rift of happiness piercing the gloom at the moment when it seems that sorrow and suffering were to be the mutual lot of two loving hearts about to be torn asunder through an honorable deception. A story [illegible] pathos and dramatic force baffle description.

"A Vacation in Havana," release of July 15, is not an educational film in its entirety as the title would seem to indicate, but [illegible] with some laughable comedy is cleverly interwoven with the scenic views of the City of Havana and places of historic interest in its vicinity.

The tragic spectacle of a happy home broken up by a father's violation of his marital vows and of his subsequent surrender to [illegible] of shame, the pathetic picture of a mother and son, the latter a mere child struggling against poverty and the rebuffs of an unsympathetic world and the edifying, inspiring sight of the father, tortured to the verge of devotion, rising out of his misery to a sense of love and duty—these are scenes in the Edison release of June 28, "The Little Fiddler." That will touch the sympathetic chord in any audience.

The story is simple and quickly told. A young father becomes a drunkard and a thief through evil associations, abandons his wife and child and plies his trade in the gilded social circle to which he has the entree. At the very moment that the wife, asleep at the sewing machine by the [illegible] apartments she calls home is living over again in her dreams that never-to-be-forgotten scene in which the husband in his drunken fury struck her to the floor and fled, not [illegible]. A street musician is playing for the passers at a fashionable music shop at which the husband is a frequent visitor. At a favorable opportunity the father steals a jewel bag from the counter which crime is laid at the door of the lad, who had previously [illegible] for his home showered with money and compliments. The father comes to the evening, in his own handsomely furnished apartments, [illegible] the jewel bag a card on which the heiress had written the name of the person's name, and realizes that the lad at whose door he has laid the crime is his own boy. Sinking to his knees overcome by a flood of memories he sees as in a vision the wife whom he had left and child stretching out her hands in supplication to save the son, who kneels beside her with tearful eyes on his father. He springs to his feet, [illegible] customs to the address of the [illegible] to save the boy from arrest by a confession of his own guilt. The [illegible] arrives with the [illegible] to say [illegible] is finally [illegible] his crime.

In addition to scenic [illegible] "Little Fiddler" is said to be [illegible] a marvel of stagecraft is "The Sinking of the Merrimac," [illegible] Lee's most [illegible] will be [illegible] the most elaborately staged moving picture [illegible] the Edison Company [illegible] the [illegible] Russian and the Spanish [illegible] tunes and settings, there are a great many [illegible] The Edison people [illegible] to the [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible] to take the same [illegible] success [illegible] it.

educational films in Lecture Hall ——, Philadelphia, Pa., on Wednesday evening, June 15, under the auspices of Mr. Chas. A. Caleluff, the Edison jobber of that city.

In connection with the demonstration a lecture on animated picture photography was delivered by Mr. L. H. Stewart, traveling representative of the Edison company, using the Model "B" as an example of the present day perfection attained in the projection of pictures. Mr. Stewart gave an interesting discussion of the evolution of the art from the old stereoscope down to the present style of machines. Mr. Stewart was followed closely throughout his lecture by the large audiences present.

The directors of the institute were so impressed by the demonstration that they immediately placed through Mr. Caleluff, an order for a Model "B".

An Edison Model "B" was recently installed by the Howard Moving Picture Company of Boston, Mass., in the Post Exchange Marine Officers School, Fort Read, [illegible], by order of Lieut. R. Tinyeau, Jr.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Some things are just too good to keep to ourselves. These are considered worth telling. You have heard so much about the "Vitagraph Life Portrayers" it seems like a work of supererogation to tell you what is heard on all sides but good words are always in line and besides these are entirely new and from so many different sources. They are interesting and go to show that the public and the exhibitor are always ready to give credit where credit is due.

Anderson, Ill., May 15, 1910.

Our patrons are loud in their praise of Vitagraph films. "Elektra" was the finest film of this nature we have ever seen. Are always glad to get a Vitagraph and we have them often.

WM. FOLKERTS.

Atlanta, Ga., May 25, 1910.

Our "first run film" to-day is your picture "Convict No. 796," and you deserve unlimited praise for the picture. The story is intensely interesting, could not be beaten. It is the kind of picture that everyone will tell their friends about.

A. C. EVANS, Vaudette Amusement Co.

Archbald, Pa., May 21, 1910.

Just a hand grasp and a word of commendation for the splendid pictures you are making. While all of the Licensed producers have shown a marked improvement in their product since the beginning of the year, you seem to have struck a stride which promises to distance them all. Last night we showed three Vitagraphs, among them "Thro' the Darkness." This picture induced more favorable comment than any we have ever shown. One of our patrons on his way out declared emphatically: "By God, Foote, that's the best acting I ever saw on or off the stage!" Keep up the good work.

RICHARD F. FOOTE, Lyric Amusement Co.

Kansas City, Mo., May 25, 1910.

I have read a lot of the success of your "Moses" pictures. I must say I ran them and advertised them and did a packing business at ten cents, although my place is on the outskirts of the city. I have one of the prettiest places in Kansas City and run nothing but first class licensed pictures and about all Vitagraph pictures of quality.

J. J. JAGODA, Clysmic Theater.

Fort Worth, Tex., June 9, 1910.

There is nothing like advertising a good picture. Our exclusive front is used for advertising Vitagraph pictures.

J. B. LACY, Scenic Theater.

Edmonton, Alberta, Can., June 7, 1910.

We were able to show the "King's Funeral" June 2, 3 and 4. A second lease showed an English film, June 3 and 4, while the so-called Independent people here exhibited an Independent film June 6, 7 and 8. We not only secured at least dozens of people tell me to-day that the Vitagraph film was by long odds the best of these shown.

A. B. LAWRENCE.

Rochester, N. Y., June 10, 1910.

We are working up considerable business on your great films. A show without a Vitagraph picture is a poor show.

Yours,

WALTER CAMPBELL, Mgr. Fitzhugh Hall.

Cincinnati, June 15, 1910.

Your picture "How Championships Are Won and Lost," with James J. Gillett and the famous "Vitagraph Girl" doing stunts, is without doubt the finest thing in nothing. I am afraid "Jeff" overlooked a good manner by side-stepping your leading lady. Vitagraph is the hit of all hits, and the best, bar none.

BARON CARL ROSS, Clifton.

Wilt, Ill., May 20, 1910.

The people here look for Vitagraph films, for they are fine. I receive service from Western Film Exchange, St. Louis, Mo.

WM. FOLKERTS.

On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, June 28 and 29, Miss Florence D. Turner, "The Vitagraph Girl," was given a Vitagraph reception at the Bijou Auditorium, Fulton street and Nostrand avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. As is generally the case when a "Vitagraph Night" is given the place where it is held is packed to the street, and those two were no exception and the enthusiasm was a gratification to the managers and exceedingly complimentary to "The Vitagraph Girl," who in addition to the hearty applause which sounded her welcome was the recipient of a number of beautiful floral pieces.

"Boarding School Romance" is due on July 5. "Between Love and Honor" on the 8th, and "Rocked" on the 9th. These are all the best and nothing can be better than the best. Nothing more can be said than has been said about these pictures. They must be seen to be appreciated. You have been told how people laugh and cry as they see the pictures. Let it suffice for you and yours to be "there" with eyes and ears and exhilarated ones. They are waiting for this announcement. "Uncle Tom's Cabin," in three numbers, one, two and three, will be released Tuesday, June 28; Friday, July 29 and Saturday, July 30.

ESSANAY NOTES.

Another charming story is announced from the Essanay's Chicago studios, entitled "The Thief." This picture is claimed by the Essanay company to be one of the best dramatic subjects ever released by them. Especial care has been taken to make the film a masterpiece. The principal characters are interpreted by Mr. Marshall, as the thief, and Mr. Beverly Shaw, as the detective. The picture is booked for release Wednesday, July 20.

Mr. G. M. Anderson, the Western producer of the Essanay Company, returned to Chicago last week from Niles, Cal., where he has been directing the production of the Essanay Western films. He expects to leave shortly for the Essanay stock company in the West will continue making Western pictures.

Mr. Anderson expressed himself as exceedingly pleased with the work of last winter's season in the Western States.

"We have had a particularly successful season," said Mr. Anderson. "and we have worked hard to give exhibitors the very best of pictures obtainable. I shall return in a short time, and the Essanay Company will continue to make Western pictures as long as our product is as eagerly accepted by the exhibitors as it is now. We shall retain most of the actors who now compose the Essanay Western stock company and shall continue operations in Colorado."

THANHOUSER NOTES.

A happy sequel to the vexed labor problem is supplied in "The Golf Strike Leader," the Thanhouser release of Friday, July 15. It shows that if the owners of factories could investigate working conditions first hand—that is, by intimate association with the workers—labor questions would be in better way of answer. In the picture under discussion, a factory owner's son does the investigation stunt. In the guise of a common workman he watches at the factory and sifts such labor troubles as he finds to the very bottom. He finds that not his father but the foreman of the factory, a mere salaried employe, is responsible for the feeling of unrest that prevails. Upon the discharge of the foreman the wheels commence to run smoothly.

ANOTHER GOOD FILM FOR THE FOURTH.

For the week of fireworks and patriotism the Thanhouser Company give "The Flag of His Country," released Friday, July 1, and announced as a "Star Spangled Banner Special." There is plenty of the hip-hip-hurrah, such as we expect to see at this time, in the subject, which is an exceedingly well photographed one, and it will undoubtedly find favor with American audiences—and foreign ones who know a good war subject when they see it.

"The Flag of His Country" incidentally tells a pretty little love story. It centers on a husband and wife divided on a National issue—the great one of States' Rights. The husband agreed with the Northern view of the question, the wife with the Southern. The wife's brother sided with the South. He and the wife, be it said, were Southern born; the husband an Ohioan who had migrated to the land of cotton.

So the husband donned the blue, and the brother the gray. After long years of conflict the husband returned home to find his wife and baby gone. He goes North; long years pass and, as a lonesome old man, visions of his loved ones come to him—Thanhouser trick photography of the most wondrous kind.

The missing wife journeys North to attend a reunion of Confederate veterans with the little granddaughter who has never seen its grandpa. The child's grand-uncle (the brother who wore the gray), who accompanies them, pins upon her a veteran's medal. The child wanders away from her grandmother and is lost.

She is found by the grandpapa she's never known. He is on the way to a meeting of his G. A. R. post and takes the tiny wanderer there. A message is dispatched to the police station, where the grandmother and uncle are anxiously awaiting news. They reach the G. A. R. meeting room and—the picture tells the rest.

The subject will please everywhere, North and South. It is one of those pretty patriotic pictures of a certain period that gives no offense to certain sections. Its appeal is national and its success should be lasting—after the Fourth as well as on it. In "The Flag of His Country" the exhibitor has a reel that should arouse patriotism the year 'round.

SELIG NOTES.

"The Red Man's Way," billed for release July 7, has been changed and the release for that date is announced as "The Way of the Red Man." This film will prove one of the sensations of the age replete with startling situations and intense human interest.

While moving our herd of camels across the country to a spot decided upon among the sand dunes of Indian, for the purpose of making one of those great big pictures for which Selig is famous, an accident occurred that caused no little excitement and likewise expense. The sacred monarchs of the desert were going along in their peaceful but ungraceful strides, unheeding the honk! honk! of the joy rider approaching in the rear. A sudden lunge, a cloud of dust—a few feminine screams and more dust, and when the dust was over and the debris cleared away, it was doubtful whether the camels or the auto had gotten the worst of it, as in the sudden encounter a few upper cuts from the camels' hoofs had made a telling effect upon the enemy, to say nothing about the rattled disposition of the spectators, who found it was not a milk wagon they had hit, but a new experience they won't forget soon. The camels are back on the job—the auto is in the shop.

The production of "Human Hearts" with Hal Reed in his part created by him almost a score of years ago is in preparation and will be ready for an early release.

The announcement of the fact that William B. Patten has been secured for a special production of "The Minister's Son" on film by the Selig Polyscope Company has caused no little amount of comment and will be looked forward to with favor by every exhibitor in the East, South and Middle West, through which territory he has toured for the past twelve years with his various productions.

The Selig Polyscope Company have in preparation a production that will cost more money and more time in perfection and detail than any picture ever attempted in the moving picture field. To say this film will prove a surprise, wonder and amusement, is putting it mildly, and it will represent the laborious effort of over six months and the outlay of a fabulous sum when it comes to buying exclusive and protected rights to such productions. Few would dare attempt even the negotiations of such a deal. For obvious reasons it is deemed advisable to withhold the announcement of the title for a short time. Watch for page announcement.

"I wonder what these camera men are doing on the train headed to Reno?"

"Don't know, sir. See their baggage is all marked with a diamond S."

(With suppressed emotion) "Can it be possible, then, my dream——"

Repeated) "I fear the worst——"

In desperation) "What! he'll he promised——"

"To heck with the promise. The cook that set your dough used salt instead of yeast."

The train pulled out amid the cheering throng and the Knights Errant like a herd led to the slaughter amid the dying strains of the Swan Song.

Fred Walton tells before the moving picture camera and becomes a Selig feature in the roster comedy production, "The Hall Room Boys." Mr. Walton is known throughout America and Europe as the monarch of silent comedy and the securing of such a well known artist to picturedom can but reflect well credit upon the aggressiveness of Selig, whose motto is and always has been to adopt the best procurable of one's line of presenting. Mr. Walton to the picture fans this film has made possible one of the greatest comedy reels in the history of moving photography.

An early release by the Polyscope will be a big dramatic picture revival of "The Phoenix" with Milton and Dolly Nobles in their original parts. We have noted the great interest exhibitors in general manifest in seeing their old-time dramatic favorites in the plays in which they were so brilliantly known and in presenting Milton and Dolly Nobles in "The Phoenix" one of the greatest of the well-known plays will be given to picturedom. It is sure to create a demand for this class of subjects.

Hal Reid has been specially retained by the Selig Polyscope Company and will appear as Tom Logan in "Human Hearts," the part created and made famous by him. Every effort is being made to make the master drama of far-reaching merit, and it should prove a glorious success, as Mr. Reid is one of the best known actors in America.

"The Way of the Red Man" is a new one on the way, and the story runs as follows: An Indian farmer and his wife protect and secrete a gambler who has injured a cowboy in a fight over a game of cards. The gambler repays the Indian by stealing the affections of his wife, a beautiful Indian woman of eighteen. Great is the dismay of the Indian on finding his wife in the arms of the white man whom he had befriended. His first thought is to kill the destroyer of his home, but he decides to give the squaw to the gambler and when she attempts to take her infant the Indian interposes. "You take the squaw, the child stays with me." Five years later we see the effects of the union between the gambler and the squaw. He has become a confirmed drunkard and the squaw, through abuse, neglect and hardship, is dying. The Indian learns of this and his manner of vengeance is unique and gives this picture story its name, "The Red Man's Way."

MAZEPPA.

Master Film Production Coming.

Mazeppa, the infant son of a Tartar chief, was captured by the Poles, and grew into manhood in the Polish land, never knowing his true parentage. Through his bravery and gallantry he became the favorite page of Olinska, daughter of Castellan, a Polish noble. Mazeppa was the favorite of all women and the envy of all men. He loved Olinska and his love was returned, but this was against the plan of Castellan, who had made preparations to marry her to Count Premislas. Mazeppa forced a duel with his rival, in which the latter was seriously wounded and the enraged Castellan, as a punishment to Mazeppa, had him tied to the back of a wild and desperate horse, in spite of the pitiful entreaties of Olinska.

The helpless Mazeppa was driven through forests and rivers, attacked by wolves, drenched by the rain, then scorched by the sun, with the ropes that bound him buried deep into his flesh, longing for death. He reached the Tartar camp, where the exhausted horse at last dropped. Mazeppa was discovered and relieved from his tortures by kind hands and by means of a mark on his breast was recognized by the Tartar chief as his son. Mazeppa was instructed by the warriors to go after and recover Olinska. However, by great luck that is usual, Olinska had escaped and returned to him then all else. Disguised as pursuers, he and a number of his followers entered the home of Castellan, where they were engaged in a revel at the festivities of Olinska's marriage, which was about to take place at her father's command. At the opportune moment the Tartars overpowered the house of Castellan and secured Olinska, who came promised wife for all time, with her happy lover, Mazeppa.

RANCH LIFE IN THE GREAT SOUTHWEST.

History with Its Makers.

The greatest assemblage of the world's celebrities ever brought together in a single picture, in dramatic and death-defying feats of genuine pure human endurance. A picture the scene of which will be laid in every corner of the earth, marvelous in conception and [illegible] correct to every detail.

There is no sham, no imitation, no make-believe in the thrilling, true representation, no stuffed steers here, the original and only genuine and absolutely Wild West film. It is real life instead of [illegible] generated by the presence of the brave and hardy men who helped to make it and in many instances saved it with their blood in desperate struggles and fierce personal encounters with the most formidable and treacherous of all savage foes. In this, in addition to the living heroes of the world's celebrities of the plains, we see besides the purest and most authentic ethnological exhibit film ever produced. With such celebrities as Henry Grammer, Tom Mix, Pat Long, Johnny Mullins and Charles Inspan it is as far apart from any and all other pictures as the distance between the poles.

VENGEANCE OF MILLESAUNTE.

In the "Vengeance of Millesaunte" the Selig Polyscope Company presents a medieval story of great power and interest, affording not only especially for strong dramatic work, but for a very great production, showing all the pageantry and state of a tournament at arms before King [illegible] X.

The picture will be found to contain an educational interest as well as a stirring story, for the closest attention has been paid to the subject as accuracy and attention to archeological details in the laws, [illegible] customs and scenery, and the manners of the twelfth century have been adhered to with scrupulous accuracy.

The plot hinges upon the ancient right of an accused person to demand a champion, who shall fight in the lists. The decision of the judges depends upon that champion's success or failure.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE

CONCERNING

Motograph Films

On account of delay in construction of the Motograph Laboratories, together with the uncertainty of having printing and developing done by others, it has been decided to discontinue releases for the immediate present. Meanwhile, exchanges and the trade as a whole may rest assured much effort and expense will be devoted to the creating of noteworthy negatives and the perfection of many important details, made impossible by our premature appearance on the market in an effort to support and strengthen a worthy cause.

We Frankly Offer Our Apologies to the many exchanges who so kindly and loyally supported our initial issues for the imperfections which characterized them. principally caused by the unintentional mistakes of others. We want the Motograph Product to stand on its own bottom and rise or fall on its own merit, or lack of it, without resorting to subterfuges and excuses, and, for that reason, intend to put our own house in order and complete our own productions before making future releases. And in the meantime—

Don't be deceived by the unfurling of false banners, the bold promises of "coming soon" brands (which may never materialize), and the publication of deliberately exaggerated telegrams, written and published for effect by both parties interested, and to strengthen a tottering tower slowly and surely being washed from its foundation by the waves of competitive quality on one side and the turning tide of an unfortunate connection with a disastrous combination on the other.

DON'T BE MISLED BY A MULTIPLICITY OF FILM BRANDS WHICH DO NOT EXIST. You owe it to yourself, and to the industry, to thoroughly investigate the location and character of every advertised factory from whom you are presumed to receive films. Make them prove their existence.

THE ASSOCIATED-BIANCHI-COLUMBIA-ARMAT-JENKINS FACTORIES REALLY EXIST and are actually in operation NOW. They have been advertised honestly and fairly without red fire or thunder.

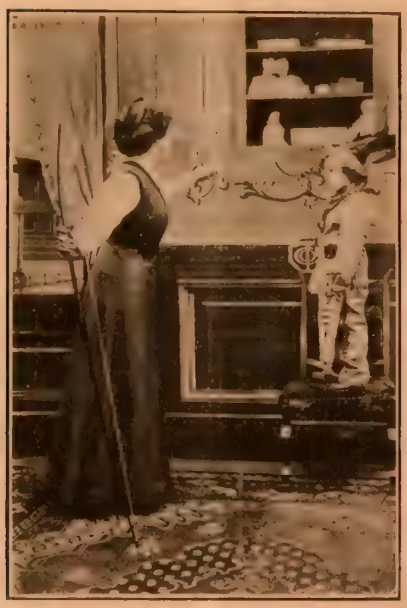
The Lucky Shot

A Shot That Found a Fortune! A Shot That Brought Prosperity! A Shot That Made Sunshine Out of Darkness and Changed Night into Day! The Most Wonderful Shot on Record AND A SURE SHOT FOR THE WISE EXHIBITOR! ORDER!



Scene from "THE LUCKY SHOT"

Jack Hunt, the son of a wealthy woman, falls in love with Nell Horsley, who is in the chorus of a musical comedy. They are married, but when Jack's mother is informed, she declares she will have nothing to do with Nell, although she is willing to forgive her son. But Jack sticks to his wife, and for a time they are very happy.

Then Jack, who is in the militia, is called out on strike duty, and meets his death during a fight with strikers. The widow takes the news to her mother-in-law, who nevertheless retains her hatred for Nell, despite the tragedy.

As time passes, Mrs. Hunt becomes a miser. She disposes of all her property, receiving in exchange money and jewels which she hides in a secret place in her room. In the mean time Nell has a hard time to get along and keep a roof over her head and that of her little boy. So desperate are her circumstances, that she finally sinks her pride and appeals to her mother-in-law. The old woman repulses her again; her fit of rage brings on a stroke of apoplexy, and she drops dead after Nell leaves.

All her property goes to little George, as the woman left no will, but search fails to locate anything except the family homestead. Nell is about to sell that, when she makes a discovery. Playing "Indian" with her boy, she shoots arrows aimlessly about the room. One of them hits the secret spring of the treasure vault, and the accident puts the boy and his mother beyond want for the rest of their lives.

The Converted Deacon

Herein is pictured one of those rare stories that are perhaps only to be found in Thanhouser subjects—a story with a big, sudden twist at the finish that will make you marvel how the writer thought it all out! WRITE FOR THIS RIGHT NOW!

May Sanders is the daughter of a farmer, Deacon Sanders, who is nearly as poor as he is religious. May goes to the city to seek employment, and her father warns her to shun theatres and bad company. Her first job is a maid in the home of Mrs. Carr, wife of a theatrical manager. Mrs. Carr discovers that May can sing and dance exceptionally well, and her husband places May on the stage.

She makes a hit right from the start. Also she annexes the affections of John De Lacy, a wealthy young man. But she does not dare to tell her parents of her new vocation.

Matters drag along until the Deacon unexpectedly arrives in town. May has still pretended to be a maid of Mrs. Carr, and the father finds her in the house when he calls. He tells her that her mother is ill, and she is needed at home. She goes and is promptly put to work on the farm.

John follows his sweetheart to the country, and to be near her, pretends to be poor, and secures a job on the farm. A news paper gives the Deocon a clue to the mystery, and he prepares to disown his daughter. But when she sings and dances, his anger melts, he forgives May and John, who later marry with the paternal blessing.

Approximate Length, 1,000 Feet No. 125 Code Word, Deacon

July 1st, 1910.

MR. J. H. HALLBERG.

Dear Sir:—I purchased one of your 220 volt Economizers for alternating current from Colorado Film Exchange, and in twelve weeks it has made a saving on the juice bill of $125.10. My light bill on direct current, using old style rheostat, run from $13.75 to $14.50 per week. As a basis to work on, I took $14 per week and subtracted my weekly bills from that amount. In the twelve weeks since I have been using the Economizer, my bill has run as low as $3.05 and the highest $1.05. I think our light is good. The operator has to watch his light little more closely than with direct current. The Economizer has paid for itself and is now making $10 per week for me. Yours truly.

Summer and the Picture.

About this time last year, in the course of our visits to several moving picture theaters, we took occasion to compliment and congratulate several exhibitors who were showing intelligence in ministering to the comfort of their patrons in various little ways. For example: In respect of plenty of fans in order to keep the air of the theater in circulation. Then, again, we were gratified occasionally by a glass of ice water. Also, the temperature of the house was kept beautifully low. We recur to this topic in the interests of the exhibitor who, of course, finds his attendance dwindling when Summer sets in with its usual severity. Even so, though the outdoor life is the most popular with all of us, a well conducted moving picture theater by no means loses all its attracting powers when Summer is here. That is why we want to impress upon the exhibitor, especially he who has his house in a crowded center of population, that if that house acquires a reputation for coolness, cleanliness and refuge from the heat, he may still go on doing good business right through the torrid time of year.

These last few weeks we have done a great deal of traveling through New York City,—on the elevated railroad, on the surface car, and let it be said in an occasional automobile. Well, reader, where do you think we found our coolest traveling refuge. Why, in the much despised Subway! Not, of course, during the rush hours, but round about noon and the afternoon when the cars are not crowded. New Yorkers are skilled in the art of dodging heat, but apparently when they know that the heat can be dodged, they are not slow to take advantage of it. Your moving picture theater, therefore, in the city has got great possibilities even in the hottest weather, if a little expense be gone to, to make it cool and attractive to the tired business man who is doomed to work in the city in the hot weather, and also to the innumerable children whom the closing of the schools lets loose.

We specially suggest to the exhibitors whose houses are in large cities to consider the creature comforts of their possible patrons at this time of the year. It is a fashion to say, as we write this, "New York is empty." So it is. Still, there are two or three millions of people left in the city and they demand to be amused part of the day or night. The enterprising moving picture exhibitor who caters for them in the way we suggest will surely not go unrewarded. A walk along Fourteenth street shows there is commendable enterprise in this respect. The advantages of cool interiors are set forth. This is as it should be. There is one thing about sitting and watching the picture on the screen—it is silent, and you do not get so hot in the body as you do if you watch a comedy, or a drama, or a tragedy on the talking stage. Your physical emotions are not so deeply stirred. You are not jarred by the human voice or by many conflicting voices. It is a silent entertainment. We know silence is favorable to keeping the body at an equable temperature, so that the moving picture may be reasonably regarded as an almost ideal Summer entertainment.

We are watching the possibilities of the airdome, and shall have something to say on this branch of the business in future articles.

The Topical Picture.

On former occasions it has been pointed out in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that American film manufacturers pay less attention to the preparation of topical pictures than the film manufacturers of other countries. London, for example, over a span of several years—nay, not merely London, but the British Isles—existed on the topical picture. It is only recently that the dramatic subject has come to the fore. The reason for the popularity of the topical picture in the British Isles is simply this, that unlike the United States, it is not a country of magnificent distances. Practically the life of the nation, the ceremonial, official, sporting and public life is lived within a few hours of the capital, so that it is a comparatively simple matter for a film manufacturer to photograph an event of public importance in the day time, and have the pictures on the screen at the principal theaters in the evening. Thousands of miles in the United States separate the day's important happenings, so that it becomes largely an impossibility to photograph them, and show them on the screen the same night in the great centers of population. Still, for all that, we perceive a decided desire on the part of the film manufacturers of this country to, as far as possible, take advantage of every opportunity for showing topical pictures.

Supposing the Jeffries-Johnson fight, if fight it can be called, had taken place in England, the films would have been shown the same evening in many theaters. This issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will be in the hands of its readers possibly before the pictures can be shown in this city. Nevada, you see, is such a long way off. Still the public want topical pictures, as was proved the other day by the enterprise of Dintenfass in photographing the Abernathy boys. Then, again, when Mr. Roosevelt landed in New York, pictures of the procession in which he figured were shown the same night. If we are not very much mistaken there is distinct evidence from this and other happenings that the public is not so indifferent to the topical pictures as we were given to understand they were a year or two ago. At the time of which we are writing, we mentioned to several manufacturers the fact that possibily topical pictures would be popular with the public of New York City and the public of other cities. We were met by the retort that the public did not care for these pictures. Apparently they do, otherwise we should not see these Roosevelt-Abernathy pictures produced.

Take New York as a typical center of population in the United States; there is something doing in the public sense nearly all the time, and so there is in and about other large centers of population. There are the worlds of sport, public ceremonies, parades, great outdoor gatherings, in fact, every phase of outdoor life constantly passing before one's eyes like an everchanging pageant. Do you not think, therefore, that the millions of people who are unable through force of circumstances to figure in these events, do you not think that these people would not be interested in seeing pictures of them on the screen? We most decidedly do. Take for example, the progress of baseball, of racing, yachting, trotting, the life of the coast, in fact the one hundred and one happenings that are daily occurring. We believe that in this the enterprising film manufacturer has a great opportunity for feeding the insatiable appetite of the public for topical films. Across the Atlantic the moving picture is often termed the pictorial supplement to the daily newspaper. Is it not conceivable that it can be so treated and regarded in this country? The possibilities of the topical picture have not been so fully developed as they might be.

The Living Picture Revealing Nature.

One of the most interesting moving pictures recently brought forward, is that of a Rose gradually opening from bud to flower.

Photographed at regular intervals, each stage of growth and development is faithfully secured until the full growth of the flower is complete. When mounted upon a reel and thrown upon the screen, not only is a beautiful growing picture the result; but a new educational purpose is brought forward. A continuation of photographs of this kind in the world of nature is going to be of great value in all classes of natural history and science.

When Oriental Art was first introduced in Europe the "floral treatments" of the Chinese and Japanese artists were looked upon as distinct features of their National Art, and, while peculiar in style and color were admired rather than criticised. This was not the case, however, with the Oriental artists' treatment of birds:—absurd, ridiculous, grotesque and impossible were the criticisms hurled at the strange and fantastic shapes often given to the Japanese rooster as painted on screens, kimonas or Chinese placques. An ignorance of the true was ascribed to the students of the yellow races, a crudity of perception and execution was pityingly bestowed upon them by the western art world; so much so that in European Art schools, when the work of students was being criticised it was not uncommon to hear the remark "as ugly as a Japanese bird" or "like a Chinese flower," &c., &c.

What was the true situation? Were the Oriental artists or the western critics right or wrong? The living picture solves the problem and answers the question. Instantaneous photography catching animals and birds in every possible motion, has shown that some how the slant eye of the Oriental had caught some of those positions the European eye had failed to detect; the "grotesque" positions were positively true; the "impossible" was actually life like. And, while lacking in many details of cultured style and finish, living pictures have proved that the foundation upon which they worked was absolutely correct. Thus the living picture giving the movements of animals and birds together with the development of flowers has put a new life in Art.

Much has been heard lately of "Nature fakirs" and a "Roosevelt came to judgment" in deciding habits and customs of animals and birds; only recently did the hunting Colonel of the Rough Riders declare that a certain artist had made a mistake in the action he gave to a running elephant. The artist depicted the elephant with the usual four footed action of the majority of animals when running. This is not right, says Roosevelt; an elephant runs with the double swinging action of a pacing horse. The point is one of many of a similar interesting nature; the living picture will decide them all.

It is recorded of the famous animal painter, Sir Edwin Landseer, that in the earlier days of his career he would stand in close proximity to his exhibited pictures; hoping thereby to glean helpful points from the comments of the people. These were often helpful he declared. The most important one recorded is that of a farm yard picture with a litter of pigs in the foreground feeding from a trough. A farmer happening to pass was, of course, drawn to the familiar scene. "'Tain't Nature," he was overheard to express:

"What is not natural, my friend?" asked the unknown Landseer. "Who ever saw a lot of little pigs feeding unless some of them had their forefeet in the trough." Landseer saw his error at once; he had placed the little animals with decorous mechanical care on four feet with only the head in the trough. He gladly accepted the farmer's "true to nature" description, altered his picture; declaring it gave new life to the work and taught him a valuable lesson. As the prince of animal painters, who can imagine what magnificent paintings might have grown under Landseer's brush could he only have had the advantage of the living picture. With this knowledge and these experiences who can fail to foresee the great help coming from the use of the living picture in nature. A set of pictures showing the process of a hatching chick is probably one of the most unique to this date. From the development of the germ to the cracking of the shell shows all the growing stages of incubation; and from the cracking of the shell to the liberated chick, these growing movements of the infant bird while very interesting are increasingly educational in value.

Cash vs. Credit.

So much has been said of late in the trade concerning the payment for films by the Exchanges on the C.O.D. basis, that we determined to make an investigation on our own account in order to gain, if possible, the arguments on both sides of the question.

First of all, we approached some merchants and bankers in other lines of trade with a view of securing a general idea of credits given and demanded. We find that there are distinct lines drawn as regards credit in lines where the merchandise bought and sold is of a perishable character, or rather merchandise which deteriorates quickly. In such lines of trade, the terms are invariably cash all along the line from producer to consumer. We fail to find credits given of any length, except where the intrinsic value of the merchandise can be maintained for a contracted period.

With this information in hand, we sought at once some of our most important film manufacturers and give herewith, as briefly as possible, the consensus of opinion among them. The film manufacturer pays spot cash without discount for his raw film stock, and in all instances among the independent manufacturers it is necessary to carry a considerable amount of this on hand, it being imported, and delivery sometimes uncertain. All expenses connected with taking a picture, including theatrical talent, transportation, etc., are paid for in cash on the spot, the only exception being where weekly or monthly salaries are paid. In order to successfully put regular releases on the market, the manufacturer must have a number of negatives made and paid for several weeks in advance. From the foregoing statement it will be seen, therefore, that there is a steady outlay of thousands of dollars for weeks prior to the time when the manufacturer is in a position to market his product. We are not at liberty to disclose some of the exact figures given us, but we admit frankly that we were more than surprised to learn the tremendous cash capital which is required in the up-to-date moving picture plant before returns of any kind on the investment can be realized.

Because of the perishable nature of films, none of our banks are willing to carry any of this burden, which means that the manufacturer must stand the risk and not solely for these reasons, the manufacturer is desirous of maintaining a fixed program of payment for all the goods he ships.

Our next visit was to some of our exchange people. Here we find a condition which is considerably more complicated than that existing among the manufacturers. Competition is keen, and the independent exchange man of to-day is required to hustle, early or late, in order to hold his customers. These customers are not always of sound financial standing, and it seems, from our investigation, that they frequently ask for and receive many favors, most of which are the extension of credit, notwithstanding that it is an unwritten law all over the country that exhibitors should pay cash in advance for service. This has been a source of considerable loss to all the exchanges throughout the country, and we believe there is hardly an exchange in the Independnt ranks that has not lost considerable sums of money through their indulgence with the exhibitors who have never paid for service.

These credits have lapped from week to week, and in many instances have drawn so heavily on the resources of the exchange that they have been forced to ask for credit from the manufacturer in order to continue their purchases of weekly releases.

Another evil which seems to beset the exchange is the over-purchase of weekly releases. There seems to be a desire among the exchange men to purchase as big a line of first run film as his competitor, with the hope that he will be able to secure business to warrant such purchases. With larger purchases than his business will actually demand, in many instances he is forced to cut prices in order to secure a return on his investment. This course of procedure has drawn the exchange man into a speculative business, and in a large measure has estranged him from sound business principles. The manufacturer by extending credit to him has been largely in the past responsible for this, and in his endeavor to increase his sales he has unconsciously encouraged such speculation.

In an interview with the Sales Company we learn that all shipments through them will be strictly on the C.O.D. basis, and that no exception of any kind will be made.

This paper, of course, having the interest of the exchanges as well as the manufacturer at heart, cannot take a definite stand on either side of this question, but it would seem to us that since all the independent film is going to be shipped after the 18th of July through one source, the Sales Company, and will be shipped strictly on the C.O.D. basis, this fact offers to the Independent exchange man a rare opportunity to enforce the same rigid conditions of payment from their customers, and at the same time put their house in order by reducing their purchases to a basis commensurate with their actual business in hand.

FIGHT PICTURES NOW BEING PRINTED.

Messrs. W. T. Rock and J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company, arrived in New York on the morning of the 8th, having made a record run from Reno. We are told that more wonderful and interesting than the fight pictures themselves will be the preliminaries and the pictures of champions and ex-champions and celebrities who attended the great fight. Mr. Blackton said that three Selig, three Essanay and four Vitagraph cameras were in constant use, and out of all the negatives they will cull only the best, such as will give a two-and-a-half hour exhibition such as has never before been seen in the history of sporting events, and probably never will be seen again. The interest these pictures have aroused throughout the entire world and the advertising they are getting from people who think they should be stopped, should make them a gold mine for the exhibitor in sections where they can be shown. The hue and cry against the pictures themselves is silly. They are mere records of an event. What those returned should have done was to prevent the fight. But as it took place there is no moral reason why the pictures should be debarred. It is nonsense to say that they will have a baneful effect upon women and children, for they will not be shown in mixed programs in family theaters. The high cost of them will prevent this. The fight pictures will constitute a full program themselves and will be advertised as such, and those who do not want to see them can stay away.

The Arithmetic of the Independent Situation.

The heavenly calm of peace which has descended upon the Independent moving picture field these last few days has given us the opportunity of reverting to a topic which we feel it our duty in the interests of the business to hammer away at over and over again in these pages. That is the economic position of the Independents. This time last year there were practically only two, and in reality there was only one, Independent manufacturer. To-day, according to the records as printed in our last number, there are fifteen Independent manufacturers actively engaged in the production of films. There are probable additions to that number who will be releasing very shortly; so that, in round numbers, there are at this moment, roughly, about twenty Independent manufacturers of moving picture films in the United States, to nine licensed manufacturers. The ratio is as two to one: a very curious situation.

Who would have thought this time last year that to-day there would be twenty Independent manufacturers to nine licensed manufacturers? We thought there would be. A few other people who watched the situation as keenly as we do, also thought the same. The generality of people, however, exhibitors, renters and others interested in the trade, were hardly prepared to see so many neophytes come to the fore. Still, there are the facts of the case, and in the interests of the business as a whole, we have to consider what influence upon the future of that business the growth in numbers of Independent manufacturers may possibly have. This we will briefly do.

In round numbers,—very round numbers,—there are about ten or eleven thousand moving picture theaters and other places of amusement which use the moving picture in this country. Of that number (in round numbers) the Independent manufacturers cater to about 3,000 houses. So that, while nine licensed manufacturers cater for 7,000 houses, 20 Independent manufacturers cater for 3,000 houses. Proportionately, therefore, if nine licensed manufacturers supply 7,000 houses, surely not more than four or five Independent manufacturers should or ought to be needed for 3,000 houses. An irrefutable deduction.

The figures with regard to the number of entertainment houses in this country which use the moving picture are approximate. Still, they are arrived at after many inquiries. Even the Patents Company's officials do not accurately know the number of houses which the company controls, because there is the constant ebb and flow of change. Houses go out of business, others take their place. Broadly speaking, however, there are more houses built than go out of business. The number then is evidently on the increase, which is a gradual and not a very rapid one. The sum seems to work out, as far as we can discover, proportionately to population. The public, as the public always does, makes its demands silently felt. Let us make ourselves clear: The population of the United States at the present time is, roughly, 90,000,000. There are 10,000 houses devoted to the moving picture; dividing 90,000,000 by 10,000, we arrive at the deduction that there is one moving picture house for each 9,000 of the population. This may not be absolutely accurate, but it gives us a line as to public requirements which is confirmed by the experience of other countries. For instance: The British Isles have a population of 45,000,000, and in those islands, there are, as far as can be ascertained, roughly between 4,000 and 5,000 houses which use the moving picture. This again works out as one moving picture place of entertainment to each 9,000 of the population.

The other aspect of the matter, namely, that of the supply and demand of the manufactured article, which is what we are inferentially raising in this article, is one, of course, that will work itself out in its own way in accordance with the rigid laws of political economy. If the supply exceeds the demand, why, then, somebody, like Othello, will "find his occupation gone." In other words, it is possible, nay probable, that if the Independent movement throughout the country does not very largely augment, then, by this time next year, we are not justified in looking for the continued existence of the business of so many Independent manufacturers.

We are not writing this article in any alarmist frame of mind, or with any desire or intention to frighten or timorize recent entrants into the Independent manufacturing end. We want to put the facts of the situation before them, however, in a cold, clear, businesslike way, so that each reader may be in a position to draw his own conclusions. There is only one opinion that we unreservedly commit ourselves to, and it is this, that it will be a very haphazard proceeding for anybody, no matter whom, at the present time, to enter the Independent moving picture field with any hope of success, unless he has something transcendent in the way of quality to offer the trade. But that, as Kipling says, is another story, which we are treating in other articles in THE WORLD.

HIGH-GRADE MOTION PICTURES.

An exhibitor of the Pacific Coast in writing to us regarding his film service gives us to understand that scenic and educational pictures are in great demand. As we have always contended that moving pictures, notwithstanding the constant stones thrown at them by ministers and newspapers, would assert themselves and in course of time become the universal educator, we are pleased to quote some passages from the letter of our correspondent as a proof that the better classes are fast becoming friends of cinematography:

"* * * and we have to be content with this old commercial service at a high price because no film exchange will enter the field. Good 'comedy,' 'scenic,' 'magic,' 'industrial' and 'educational' pictures are few and far between. The film makers do not seem to realize that in failing to make enough of that class of pictures they are fast putting the exhibitors out of business, which will soon put the makers out. * * * In my neighboring town of 5,000 people there are two stock companies running at ten cents and twenty cents, and a picture show cannot live. Why? Simply for the lack of 'comedy, scenic, magic, industrial and educational pictures.' It seems that if the people are forced to witness dramas they prefer to patronize real live actors. . . ."

According to the letter of our correspondent, he seems to claim that his patronage calls for the scenic and educational films, but that the local exchange, perhaps managed by a man of little intelligence, does not want to purchase such films, but, on the contrary, tries to force on the exhibitors the drama and sensational films.

We thank our correspondent for his letter, as it is great time that the exchanges should reason the question and not buy films only for the morbid classes of exhibitors and spectators. J. M. B.

The exchanges have no excuse, as the manufacturers are producing a liberal supply of scenic and educational films.

"ALWAYS RIGHT."

A writer in the Moving Picture World argues that the real mission of the motion picture theater, as distinguished from the motion picture itself, is to entertain and amuse. The World is right. The amusement picture should be wholesome and may be indirectly instructive, but it is not the educational feature that draws 20,000,000 Americans into picture houses every week—not yet at least. Maybe yes, when the great uplift becomes universal some thousands of years hence.—Spectator in "The Dramatic Mirror."

The Moving Picture in Relation to the World.

By Rev. H. F. Jackson.

Great events happen suddenly! Although minor incidents are accumulating in an unhidden and deliberate manner, the final combinations form a climax which seems to burst forth unheralded and unexpected. This is as often true of a material public benefit as it may be of a personal or national event. It was said of a certain great English statesman that although he had toiled hard to obtain a national reputation, he most signally failed until a certain incident brought together the fruits of his labors; and "one morning he arose to find himself famous," and famous with a fame which never left him.

In a similar way the great American nation, silently building up its own strength, was not looked upon through European eyes as a World Power. The Spanish War, however, proved the climax, the gathering forces of the years at one stroke placed the United States in the forefront of the nations of the world, and to-day her position is pre-eminent. In like manner this sixth day of July the moving pictures have become a world-wide factor and of such world-wide importance that it has to be reckoned with, consulted and considered. The Jeffries-Johnson fight has been the incident—and only the incident—which has gathered up the growing forces of the kinematograph's development, and to-day the whole civilized world is beholding the moving picture as the center of its interest. The New York newspapers each have heavy headlines dealing with the problem, and without doubt the newspapers of every other city are similarly engaged. Reading the telegraphic reports that not only is every city and State on this continent studying the question, but England, Australia and South Africa are interesting themselves in the outcome. The writer of this article wishes it to be distinctly understood that he is in no way entering into the merits or demerits of the Jeffries and Johnson fight, or with the moving picture reproduction of the fight; to do so here would be a meretricious opening of the moral questions at issue.

The one object not in view is to show the world-wide value and importance of the moving pictures. A decade ago the value of the kinematograph was practically unknown; to-day its value is being uinversally weighed. At the request of a great convention now in session in Boston, every Governor of every State in the Union of the United States is being specifically asked to give the matter his serious attention. Every mayor in every city is considering the question; and everywhere civilization is within the present forty-eight hours debating the question of the reproduction of the great fistic combat.

Thus, in a moment as it were, the moving pictures have become a world issue; not as to its value—that is admittedly great; but as to its use. It is the world's eye, and the world is deciding what it shall behold and keep upon its everlasting retina; or what it shall reject. It is the world's conscience being impressed with every event and the will of the world will be the decision of the uses to which this great modern educator shall beutilized.

It is our pleasure to record the supremacy of this our protege; we desire only the best results for the good of humanity in the whole moving picture world, which is now the universe itself.

In this connection it is certainly wise to set forth two conclusions suggested by immediate events. The living pictures are now a universal factor to be reckoned with and the world at large acknowledges their value, respects their powers and recognizes their possibilities and without doubt will be governed accordingly.

In like manner, on the other hand, those engaged in the commercial aspect of the moving picture must now realize that they have the world at large to deal with. Governments and governors of higher or lower degree, people of every shade of thought and purpose are their clients and the attention given them will be amply repaid by a grateful and appreciative recognition.

Why I Favor the Moving Pictures.

By Jane Ellen Scott.

Of all the inventions and discoveries of modern times nothing is more wonderful, perhaps, than the moving picture. Through the medium of the moving picture one can visit almost every land on the globe, and become familiar with life among the different nations and peoples of the earth, of all time, and of all the ages. In this way one can learn much of literature, much of art, without the necessity of close application and diligent study; he can also become familiar with the processes of many industries that he would otherwise know nothing about.

In addition to these attractions is the real, genuine pleasure that one derives from this source. A pleasure so cheaply purchased that it comes within the reach of the very poorest. The tired father, the weary mother, the little boy or girl, whose range of vision has never extended beyond the narrow street, or alley, in which their lives have been passed, enters the moving picture theater, and for a time at least, dwells in a veritable paradise.

Moving pictures may now be seen in many, if not all, the leading cities and considerable towns of the world. They have found their way into the Celestial Empire and are said to be doing more to awaken long slumbering Cathay than all other influences combined.

Some of the scenes presented in moving pictures have been pronounced harmful, by local censors, which is no doubt true in many cases; which only goes to prove that, like some other things in life, this most modern source of amusement has its baneful side. But as there is a National Board of Censors, which sits in judgment upon all plays, before they are presented to the public, it would seem that objectionable features connected with them must eventually be eliminated. One great difficulty in the way of removing the harmful features of all public plays or exhibitions, is that people differ so widely as to what is really harmful. Ofttimes great plays and operas are put upon the stage of the theaters in our leading cities which are greatly censured by some good people, while others, equally as good, see nothing to condemn. The nude in art is a shock to some, while others see in it only the highest expression of beauty, or possibly the outward expression of the artist's very soul. One mother takes up the Buster Brown pictures and shows them to her little son with the greatest delight, while another will hide the pictures for fear they will put mischievous thoughts into the mind of her child.

So life goes on, and doubtless it will continue the same course while time shall last.

It was Emerson who said, "The virtues of society are the vices of the saint." But whether one represents society or the saint, if he be wise he will take an optimistic view of life and conclude that the right will eventually triumph.

Thus thinking, and thus believing, one can see in the moving pictures an excellent medium for the recreation and education of the people.

Edison Patriotism.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

Way, way over in Jersey City, far, far from old Broadway, I was compelled to go, in order to get a view of the much talked of Edison production, called "The Stars and Stripes." Some who had seen the play were of the opinion that the Edison Company had surpassed themselves in this particular presentation, and I was asked by the Editor of The Moving Picture World to determine whether or not they had improved on their best "past performances." I was supposed to go in the obnoxious role of a critic. Now, critics are not only obnoxious to the criticised, but to those of other opinions. Then the world in general hates to see a man set himself up as arbiter in matters which everybody knows all about. The average critic of the play could not write one, set one or direct one, has about as much imagination as a hack scenario writer, not a convolution in his gray matter, and enough ivory aloft to furnish materials for a full set of pool balls. The real critic, if there be any, should be able to appreciate and enjoy a play as other, less gifted, mortals do, and merely suggest minor details of a helpful nature for the future consideration of the producer.

Having taken pains to show what a critic should be, I will proceed to demonstrate that I am not one.

Having made the startling discovery that Keith & Proctor have a very pretty theater in forlorn Jersey City, I proceeded to enjoy the performance, particularly the Edison production.

It was a story of the birth of Old Glory, and the heroism of John Paul Jones.

On the 14th of June, 1777, Congress established the stars and stripes as our national flag.

On that same day, Captain Paul Jones had the distinguished honor of spreading the beautiful banner to the breeze, and this episode forms the historical introduction to the Edison play.

John Paul wrote to the Dutch minister, at Hague:

"America has been the country of my fond election from the age of thirteen, when I first saw it. I had the honor to hoist, with my own hands, the flag of freedom, the first time it was displayed on the Delaware, and I have ever since attended it with veneration."

Our newly made country was then at war with the greatest naval power on earth. Britannia actually ruled the seas, with over a thousand war vessels, whereas our navy, with its five hastily constructed vessels, was regarded as more or less of a joke.

What a terrible joke it proved to be!

Lord Brassey only recently spoke of the American Revolution as marking the darkest period in England's naval history.

The brilliant succession of victories won by the Americans would make an interesting and instructive series of motion pictures, but the Edison producers selected a striking event that occurred off the east coast of England in plain view from shore between the old and clumsy converted merchantman, "Bon Homme Richard," under John Paul Jones, and the crack British frigate, "Serapis," faster and more heavily armed than the American vessel. This fierce naval duel, one of the bloodiest ever fought, began late in the day and continued by moonlight.

The moonlight picture of the vessels firing at hailing range, their broadsides flashing fire, one then the other enveloped in smoke, was tremendously effective. People craned their necks to see how it was done. There was that sure sign of interest, expectant attention, more convincing than the round of applause that greeted the flag raising. There was not enough of that moonlit battle! The story of love interwoven could have been sacrificed for the fight. The picture was such a wondrous spectacle, so exciting to the imagination, that the time allotted to it could have been doubled to the advantage of the whole effect.

Next came the scene on the upper gun deck of the "Richard."

The hail of iron was tearing through the sides, littering the deck with the dead and wounded. Cannons recoiled from their discharge, were reloaded, run out again and fired, the gunners are working with desperate energy, it was a fine ensemble. Between decks another hell was raging, but all this time the usually noisy drummer in the orchestra forgot his "boom boom," reserving his full strength for the rag-time accompaniment for the Jew impersonator in the vaudeville act.

In the thickest of the fight, the cannons used noiseless powder, but nobody cared, the drummer least of all.

Meanwhile, the pianist was turning over some sheet music with one hand and strumming "yiddle" with the other.

Down came the flag.

It was then the British thought that the American vessel had struck her colors.

It was then that Paul Jones yelled in reply to a call from the enemy: "We have just begun to fight."

A brave sailor tried to ascend the rigging and raise the flag, but he was shot in the attempt.

Midshipman Mayrant seized the colors and bore them aloft.

Another round of applause in the audience.

Then the jib-boom of the "Serapis" was seen nosing over the gunwales of the "Richard." "Boarders away!" The Americans rush over the gunwales of the British ship, then we miss the best part of the fight, the hand-to-hand conflict, with pike, saber and pistol,—not enough room in a thousand-foot reel. (When are we going to have two thousand feet reels?) The surrender of brave Captain Pearson, to his equally brave adversary, both sons of Albion, but one in rebellion against parental injustice, concluded the historical part of the play and might well have concluded the great drama itself.

What is the use of criticising?

I liked the play, and so did the other common people.

There was no attempt to force applause by using the flag. It was only displayed at appropriate moments. The sight of it in actual battle, between men who had plenty of iron in their blood, stirred the heart. We hate to see the flag vulgarly used, but we all love the beautiful banner. Whether we are Colonial-Americans or Hoboken-Americans such plays are inspiring and instructive. The people around me were delighted. Cultured or uncultured, they seem to like plays of wholesome cleanliness and noble sentiment, but, to be of value, military plays must not deal with the trivial. The evolution of the present great nation was attended with thousands of dramatic incidents. Our numerous wars, with their sacrifices and bitter struggles, furnish an abundance of enthralling themes, the struggle for mastery always holds the audience spellbound, but the stories must not ring false, there is no need of theatrical clap-trap, they must be sincere to reach a simple and responsive audience. There may be critics of the younger generation in that audience, who know the history of our struggles by heart. Producer and playwright must display an intimate acquaintance with the historical elements in the play, or it falls flat.

"The Stars and Stripes," as presented by the Edison Company, is a masterly tribute to the flag we all love.

Long may it wave!

Non-Inflammable vs. Inflammable.

A Lesson from the Vitagraph Fire.

Out of evil cometh good. The recent fire on the premises of the Vitagraph Company to which lengthy reference is made in another part of this week's World, was not an unmixed calamity, regrettable though it was, particularly for the inconvenience which it caused the highly esteemed Vitagraph Company—an inconvenience which, of course, has passed away. The fire taught a valuable lesson upon which we feel it our duty to dwell in the interests of the business. In other words, it established the amazingly practical value of non-inflammable film for the making of moving pictures; it has established the fact that the film is, even in the most trying circumstances, actually non-inflammable—a fact which is of the highest importance and should be made as widely known as possible.

There are many misconceptions prevalent with regard to the combustible properties of celluloid in the ribbon form. Loose, that is, lying about in a box under a machine, or in the workroom, or, in fact, anywhere in the loose form, there is no more dangerous substance in existence, the danger lying in its ready combustibility. Throw a piece of celluloid in a live fire, and see how quickly it burns. Not very long ago we ourselves inadvertently threw a light into a barrel containing a pile of scraps of celluloid negatives and positives. To our horror a sheet of flame instantly shot up, and were it not that we were prompt in our action, a destructive fire might have resulted. But, as we have said, we were prompt, and so there was "nothing doing" in fires.

It is a good many years now since the late George Dickman, then English manager of the Kodak Company, invited us to the Kodak works in England to witness some experiments with regard to the comparative incombustibility of rollable celluloid. Ignorant writers in the press had stated that it was combustible in any form, either loose or rolled. We remember how, in a large field, many spools of the celluloid were produced and attempts made to ignite it. But it would not be ignited; it just charred and sizzled at the edges. That was all. This is quite a dozen years ago, and writing of our experience in another publication we were the means of allaying much unnecessary alarm on the subject. Celluloid, closely rolled up, very much resembles paper when tightly packed. It is exceedingly difficult to ignite or burn. The edges are charred, but there must be a very strong fire round about before the whole body of the material takes fire.

This fact was in a way demonstrated in the recent Vitagraph fire. Before us, as we write this, is a tin such as reels are packed in, and in that tin are the charred or carbonized remains or residue of a film which went through the Vitagraph fire. The tin is comparatively uninjured. The film is just a mass of pulverlent carbon. Chemically all the other elements in the film were driven off by the great heat and nothing but approximately pure C remains. These facts with regard to the behavior of the film in such circumstances are possibly of some scientific interest, although not perhaps of great practical value.

So much for the inflammable film. At the same time we obtained possession from the debris of the Vitagraph fire of a reel of non-inflammable film which was packed in one of the ordinary tins and which went through the same heat as the film referred to in the previous paragraph; as a matter of fact, we took both tins off the same shelf. We were curious to see for ourselves how the non-inflammable film behaved. Will it be believed that, generally speaking, it was uninjured by the great heat to which it was subjected? Just the outer parts of the picture for the length of a few feet were damaged, as if the gelatine had melted, but, broadly speaking, the whole of the remaining 900 feet of non-inflammable film were uninjured by the same heat which reduced an inflammable film to the condition already described, namely, that of carbonization.

We think this fact of the imperviousness of the non-inflammable film to great heat is a very valuable one to have had demonstrated. We are glad of the opportunity of placing it on record. Its widespread publication should do much towards reassuring public authorities and the public itself with regard to the minimization of danger in moving picture entertainments by the use of non-inflammable film. Again, this experience points to the fact that in the storage of non-inflammable film there is practically no danger of combustion or ignition.

THE KEITH & PROCTOR RELEASE SYSTEM.

In former times, that is, until last Fall, we always knew where and when in the Keith & Proctor circuit of picture houses, to see a particular release of the licensed manufacturers. For example: Consulting our own table of the week's releases, we could always rely upon seeing them on a particular day at either Fourteenth street, Twenty-third street, or 125th street, as the case might be. In other words, we could safely locate a particular picture in the Keith & Proctor New York circuit. But of recent months, the introduction of vaudeville, and possibly other causes, rather spoilt the Keith & Proctor houses for this particular point. We never knew what was coming on the screen, or when it was coming on. However, it seems that Keith & Proctor have recently adopted a new system of releases, which is given below. This will not only be useful to us, but to many others interested in the picture.

Each Monday's releases will be shown as follows: Biograph, Pathe, and Selig start at Union Square on Monday; Twenty-third Street, Tuesday; Harlem Opera House, Wednesday; Keith & Proctor's, Jersey City, Thursday; Fifty-eighth Street, Friday, and 125th Street Theater, Saturday.

Monday's Lubin starts at 125th Street Theater, day of issue; Harlem Opera House, Tuesday; Jersey City, Wednesday; Fifty-eight Street, Thursday; Twenty-third Street, Friday, and Union Square, Saturday.

There is a place for everything, and everything should be in its place. One of the recent editorials in The World discussed at some length the mission of the moving-picture theater, arriving at the conclusion that that mission was not to educate or to instruct, but to entertain and amuse. "Them's my sentiments." In the same article the causes of the present unsatisfactory position of the talking stage were analyzed, and it was pointed out that similar causes might produce similar effects in the moving-picture theater. "Them's also my sentiments."

To come to the point, Is the religious picture quite in its proper place in the moving-picture theater? I raise the question, not because I am opposed to the religious picture, per se, or to religion itself—far from it—but simply from what I would call the commercial or business standpoint. Is it good business for a moving-picture exhibitor, especially on weekdays, to put religious moving pictures on the screen? Do his audiences in the mass appreciate them, or allow themselves to be repelled by them? In short, is the religious picture good business for the business?

I doubt it. I have said over and over again on this page that if the people want to be educated they can get education in the proper centers of distribution—namely, the schools, universities, and the like. What applies to education applies also to religious teaching. By all means let us have religious moving pictures in the churches. The churches, I venture to submit, are the proper places for them.

* * *

A moving-picture audience is, as I have before pointed out, like an audience in an ordinary theater. It does not like to be preached at. That is why, in the ordinary theater, the plays of Ibsen, Sudermann, Maeterlinck, Hauptman and Bernard Shaw are only partial successes, whereas, to take an instance at random, the amusing farce called "Seven Days," now running at a Broadway theater, looks as if it will last well on through the summer. It amuses people.

Let us be frank and honest. There is hardly a man of the world who is not bored by religious subjects in what I would call business hours—that is to say, the time that he devotes to his business or to his amusements. Somehow those of us who pay any heed to religion at all associate it with Sunday observances, and maybe morning and night, when we say our prayers, if we say our prayers. In modern life, so strenuous is that life, we have grown to resent the intrusion of religion upon time which must be devoted to other subjects. Understand me, I am not arguing the matter or taking either a pro or con side; I am merely stating the fact.

* * *

Even your Oberammergau "Passion Play," which originally got its prominence in virtue of the fact that it was a religious manifestation or performance, has, in the eyes of many, somewhat degenerated, because it is made the subject of a tourist pilgrimage. People go to Oberammergau, where the "Passion Play" is performed, from all parts of the world by way of diversion. Probably it has some religious influence; I do not know. Broadly speaking, it is a Summer spectacle, or an excuse for a trip. Possibly the infrequency of the performance saves it from vulgarization.

That is a point I want specially to raise in this connection—namely, the possibility of vulgarizing these beautiful religious subjects, which have been referred to in these pages for months past, in the moving-picture theater. I doubt very much whether the vast majority of those who look on them treat them with the reverance that they demand. They are rather apt to regard them, I think, as pieces of legendary drama, and not as conveying any great moral lesson. If I am wrong in this, and if there are any readers of The World who take opposite views, supported by evidence, let them come out and tell Lux Graphicus that he is taking an erroneous view of the matter.

Frankly, I do not think I am. I feel rather jealous of any influence, whatever it may be, which tends to diminish the general popularity of the moving picture. I venture to think, as I have already said, that any excessive prominence given to religious subjects in a place of secular entertainment—mark this, reader, a place of secular entertainment—may, while pleasing a more or less considerable minority, repel the greater majority. As I said at the opening of this week's sermon, there is a place for everything, and let everything be in its place. To my mind, a religious picture is out of place in a moving-picture theater for the reasons given.

Times change and we with them. Records of pre-Reformation times in the Old World show that practical religion, or rather religious observances, entered more intimately into the daily lives of the people than they do at present. For example, in those days people stopped in their work at 12 and 6 o'clock in the day to say the Angelus. They made daily visits to churches; the influence of the priest extended into every human relation. But since the fifteenth century the tendency of progress, if progress it be, has been to secularize instead of to sacerdotalize life. That is why we often read in the papers that Christianity is a failure and why churches do not fill. Again I say that I am not arguing the matter—I have my own inner private views on the subject—I am simply stating the facts as they bear on the progress of this wonderful moving-picture business.

There is a great deal of cant talked about the moving picture and its influence. It has all the uses assigned to the picture, that of being entertaining, instructive, amusing, uplifting; it has scientific, industrial, topographical, recording, military, naval and other uses. All these I cheerfully concede; it goes without saying. But what I do maintain, what I do plead for, is that each of those uses should be restricted to its own proper channel. If the picture can help religion, let it be used in the proper way—by ministers of the Gospel, in church, in order to attract people to the church. Similarly in the sciences, the industries, the arts and other branches of human industry let those uses of the picture be confined to their proper definite applications. Do not let us mix, cross or confuse those applications. Do not turn the place of entertainment into a mosaic of applications which obscure the entertainment functions of the picture.

After all, the pleasures of life are just as serious as the other duties of life. Pleasure is a duty just as much as is the care of the soul or the care of the body or the fulfillment of one's duties as a citizen. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. Those who play hardest work the best, and that is why I venture to suggest that the intrusion of religious subjects in these moving-picture houses is apt to have rather a repellent than an attractive effect. Understand me, I am not deprecating the production, sale and exploitation of religious subjects; far from it. There is an enormous field for them in the churches, chapels and other centers of religious teaching. So that in taking up this attitude I can't possibly be accused of being inimical to the best interests of the business. On the contrary, I believe that if the film makers laid themselves out to cater for all the churches, chapels, etc., of the country with specially prepared religious subjects they would enormously extend their business and at the same time be instrumental in attracting more people to those churches and chapels. The more attractive a religious service is the more people go to it; equally so the more attractive moving-picture entertainments are the more people go to them. It is not my business to help make religious services attractive, but it certainly is my business to contribute my humble quota to make the moving-picture entertainment popular and attractive, and that is why in this week's sermon on the screen I raise the question as to whether it is prudent or profitable for an exhibitor to make a practice of showing religious pictures in his theater. Mr. Exhibitor, I should be glad to hear from you on this subject.

The American Vitagraph Company of New York had a Fourth of July display of its own, and not of the sane kind either. It was also quite an expensive one, as well as a little premature, taking place on Saturday, July 2, instead of Monday, July 4. It afforded ample material for the newspapers to work upon and the press throughout the country gave ample space to accounts of it. After the business of the day had been concluded and the last three men in the film renting department were about to depart, a blaze suddenly burst forth in an apartment in which reels were stored, that resulted in the hottest kind of a fire, but the fire department was in full control of the situation within one hour after the first blaze was discovered.

Up to the present time none of the published accounts have touched definitely upon the real cause of the fire. All the papers have been content with the statement that some moving picture film exploded. I made a personal investigation after everything and everybody had cooled down and was pleased to learn that neither a cigar, cigarette, match, nor an inexperienced operator was responsible. From what I learned, and I am confident I reached the real facts, the films were not primarily responsible for the fire. The room in which the films were stored was provided with a switch by which the incandescent lights that illuminated the storage room were manipulated. The switch was of the ordinary knife pattern, but it was so peculiarly situated that a long wooden handle was required to turn the lights on and off. The switch itself was imbedded in a cement wall. About and immediately in front of the opening containing the switch was shelving upon which the reels were stored in tin cans. This shelving was about nine inches deep and the open space between the shelves was not large enough to allow one to insert his hand and reach the switch handle. As a substitute a piece of wood was attached to the handle of the switch. This improvised handle extended to the front of the shelving, within easy reach. When this piece of wood was pulled out it drew down the switch handle and put out the lights. When pushed in it made the proper connection and illuminated the room. This had been in use for several years. It is believed that the switch became deranged, as all will at times through some means, and an arc was formed. Being out of sight no defect was observable. It may have existed for weeks, or even months. The switch handle and piece of wood were fastened together by a piece of wire and the daily operation quite likely caused the wire to break, eventually causing a short circuit. At all events it was at the switch the fire was first discovered. The party first upon the scene had his attention first attracted by a puffing-like noise, followed by the rattle of tin cans upon cement floor. He rushed into the place and found two cans that had rested upon the shelf in front of the switch lying upon the floor and on fire. He seized both cans and hurled them through a window to the street below. Then he gave the alarm of fire. This part of the story sounds much like the one in a historical recital depicting the bravery of a soldier who saved the day by seizing a bomb hurled from the enemy's camp with burning fuse and threw it into a bucket of water. In the Vitagraph case the hero was Charles A. Burton, probably the best known handler of picture machines in New York. He is one of the oldest employees of the American Vitagraph Company. He attained no little distinction a few years ago by being the first operator licensed by the Department of Electricity of this city. He always displayed his card with much pride, because it bore the significant "No. 1." Unfortunately Burton's presence of mind and brave work was not productive of the desired results. After hurling the cans through the window he hurried back to the film room, but in his absence a dozen or more cans had fallen to the floor and the room was in a blaze that barred his entrance.

A visit to the film exchange Sunday morning revealed a sorry spectacle. One would hardly believe that fire could work such havoc in one brief hour. The room in which the fire started and the adjoining one were wrecked, and other parts of the building suffered considerable damage. Fortunately enough reels were rescued from the second apartment to keep the film service in operation when coupled with the vast amount of reels that had been given to customers during the day on account of the holiday season. Temporary quarters were quickly secured and when the film renters appeared Sunday morning for changes of reels they found the room staff ready for the occasion, and the service has been continued without interruption. This is certainly commendable. Phoenix like work of that character commands my admiration.

Yes, I know that other film concerns have suffered a like affliction and displayed a like spirit of recuperation, but in the Vitagraph case the circumstances have been peculiarly unequalled. We all know that the American Vitagraph Company is an adjunct of the Vitagraph Company of America. To be more exact, the latter is really an outgrowth of the former. In later years the manufacturing company has been almost distinct in relation with the rental concern, and "Pop" Rock has really been the only member of the original concern who has the identity of the two. "Pop" Rock and J. Stuart Blackton were both in Reno when the fire took place. Albert E. Smith had the responsibility of the studio on his hands and was seeking deserved recreation at Northport, L. I. I remember reading a story of a naval battle. Upon its conclusion the commanding officer asked one of his surviving staff: "Are you the only officer left?" The reply was: "No, thank God! The cook still holds the galley."

When I visited the afflicted film exchange the blackened debris astonished me, both as to quantity and the vivid reflection of what flames can do. But my astonishment increased as I wended my way through the ruins. Frankly, I have at times had serious doubts as to the virtues of non-inflammable film if put to a severe test. I no longer entertain such doubts. Reel after reel picked up from the ruins convinced me that the non-inflammable film is all that is claimed for it. Every can of it that had passed through the fire weighed not less than four and a half pounds and not a can of the inflammable film that had passed a similar ordeal weighed over nine ounces. The last was like so much dust. The non-inflammable presented a wonderfully preserved appearance, but the intense heat through which it had passed caused the several laps to adhere to each other, thus rendering the film unfit for use, but aside from a blistering of the outside lap there was no indication of inflammability. I secured two of these reels and any doubting Thomas may see them at the office of the Moving Picture World.

Since the fire a number of the municipal authorities have visited the offices of the American Vitagraph Company and have been singularly impressed by the developments resulting from the test to which the non-inflammable film was put by the fire. From remarks I have since heard dropped in several quarters this will receive more than passing attention on the part of the authorities, one of whom is credited with the remark: "This demonstration is invaluable to me. It is something I have wished for a long time."

One of the busiest men at the Vitagraph office when I called was Victor Smith, the genial brother of Treasurer Albert E. Smith, of the manufacturing. In the midst of the wreckage he was busy ordering the replacing of telephones, directing the clearing of debris, and hustling about generally to get the executive offices in shape for business. He is certainly an energetic worker. He really loves work and seems to revel in it. When the fire started he was spinning home along the Long Island roads on his new Indian motor cycle. When you see him ask him to tell you about the trip. Before reaching his destination he got word of the trouble and lost no time in making his way to the scene.

It takes such occurrences as that of last Saturday to show that while competition among film exchanges may appear to be sharp at times there is a most refreshing and gratifying underlying strata of good-will and fellowship among them. As soon as the news of the American Vitagraph's misfortune gained circulation almost every exchange offered assistance; but as it was the old reels that had been consumed the firm's customers were cared for without aid.

THE MARRIAGE OF ESTHER.

By Rev. H. F. Jackson.

Having seen another part of this series, which was much improved in the respect that many of the reproductions were colored, thereby giving more value to the costumes of the performers. The subject is, however, so incomplete, making it impossible to form an intelligent conception of the purport of the whole scene in this important incident in the national history of the Hebrew race. This instalment plan of presenting any important work is decidedly detrimental to its best interest, and must be positively unattractive to those not acquainted with the subject beforehand. Another great drawback to the true rendering and pleasant reception of this wonderful piece is the great contrast between the acting of Esther and the King; the former is modest and mild (if too mild, the fault is a good one), while the latter is tragic and wild. It almost seemed as though some great tragedy was being enacted if one followed the actions of the King unmindful of his associations. The violent stamping, gestures when walking, the useless waving of the arms and the madly pointing of the extended finger when giving a command, seem more ruffianly than kingly; such a lack of dignity and quiet authority cannot be imagined even in an Oriental monarch of centuries ago. The other characters are more subdued and in keeping with what one imagines may be compatible with the occasion and time.

The writer is anxiously looking forward to an opportunity of seeing the whole series at one time, when as a unit it may be more acceptable, pleasing and perhaps instructive.

SUCCESSFUL FILM MEN.

The Cincinnati "Post" pays a fine tribute to Messrs. McMahan & Jackson, proprietors of the Cincinnati Film Exchange and incidentally operators of a number of fine theaters. In connection with an illustration of their newest picture palace the "Post" also gives the pictures of the two youthful promoters, and says of them:

"With nickels I. W. McMahan and Jerome Jackson, Cincinnati men, have made themselves the moving picture magnates of the Middle West, operating seventeen theaters in Cincinnati, Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. The film magnate is one of the wonders produced by the moving picture.

"Venturesome persons who got in on the ground floor in the early days of moving picture popularity have plucked the worms that belong to the early bird. The magnates of the game in Cincinnati acquired what they now have within six years on a capital of $400.

"Their domain covers a large part of Hamilton County, Southern Indiana, runs as far south as Paris, Ky., and north as far as Logan, Ohio, and they are after more nickels to conquer and acquire.

"They own two large theaters on West Fifth street and run the Lyric as a motion picture house during the Summer. In addition they operate a film exchange, from which they supply theaters in the South and Middle West. They employ 300 persons in their various theaters.

"The new-fangled magnates admit they have been very lucky, sticking to the business in the early squally days when persons intending to see a picture show would buy their tickets quickly and dash through the door so as not to be seen by their friends.

"'We possessed imagination enough to see the possibilities of the moving picture and stayed on the job when others got discouraged,' said McMahan. 'There was a time several years ago when people said that moving pictures had run their course, but the most wonderful things have been produced on the films since then and now the moving picture is more popular than ever.

"'Moving pictures are now not only illustrating the vital history of the day, but are also producing show spectacles and dramas of a high order. They are being recognized as a great educational force in churches and in schools.

"'However, the chance to get rich on moving pictures by starting with a small capital is gone. There is too much competition and it is useless to start with less than $5,000 even in a suburban theater. That is the amount of the original investment necessary for remodeling of a storeroom for theater purposes and the purchase of the necessary equipment.

"'You must figure on expenses of at least $80 a week. The large theaters spend that much a day. Piano players get $15 a week and the average singer about the same amount. Film service averages about $40 a week.'

"Prominent Cincinnatians who are interested in moving pictures are H. S. Koop and O. Luedeking, merchants; Judge Lueders, Mike Mullen, Edward Hart and Rud Hynicka."

NOTICE TO EXHIBITORS.

80 Fifth avenue, New York City, July 2, 1910.

Exhibitors are notified that motion pictures and motion picture projecting machines manufactured or supplied by the Gaumont Company of New York after June 20, 1910, are not licensed by this company and must not be used by exhibitors licensed by this company.

Motion pictures made by the Societe des Etablissements Gaumont of Paris, France, and imported and supplied by Geo. Kleine of Chicago, are licensed and may be used by licensed exhibitors.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY.

WHAT THE MIRROR SCREEN WILL DO FOR THE EXHIBITOR.

It seems that not enough can be said on the mirror screen, as this simple invention has operated some wonderful miracles.

Mr. Nasser, of the Elite Theater, Forty-seventh street and Indiana avenue, who at one time was fairly disgusted with his investment and was willing to sell his house at a loss, has changed his mind since he bought a mirror screen. He claims that the expensive cost of the screen has been paid in a few weeks. He has regained his good humor, and he is no more talking of selling, at least not at a sacrifice, as if he sells it will be at an advanced price.

While the hot days cause severe losses to most of the exhibitors, the Elite holds its own, and last Sunday evening I enjoyed the crowd of a middle-Winter Sunday.

At the Garfield, Fifty-fifth and Halsted streets, I found Mr. P. Bortholomae still happy with his purchase. Proudly he pointed to me two young men who came all the way from Forty-first street (passing several shows on their way), because, as they claim, they must come to the Garfield to enjoy good pictures.

I will surprise the readers in telling them that at 9.15 on Sunday evening I had to wait on the pavement for my turn to enter the overcrowded house of Mr. Bartholomae. Think of it, a July Sunday!

Mr. Bartholomae whispered in my ear: "I have raised my price." I was surprised. I looked around and, pointing the figure 5c. to him, I asked for a meaning. He answered that he had not raised the admission, but the price on the mirror screen. In other words, some weeks ago he said that he would not sell his mirror screen for $1,000; now he would not part with it for $1,500 if he could not get another one.

Baltimore, Indianapolis, etc., told me similar stories regarding the good results obtained with the mirror screen.

BIG ELECTRICAL HOUSE PLACES GREATLY IMPROVED PROJECTOR CARBON ON THE MARKET.

The constant procession of recruits into the motion picture field forms, in itself, a very lively moving picture, and when an old firm of long established reputation and transcontinental business enters the field, it is worth while to stop the reel and look them over a bit.

One of the latest entrants into the field is the Charles L. Kiewert Company, a leading electrical house of New York, having branches from Boston to San Francisco. The new product that this company is marketing in the motion picture field is the "Bio" carbon, which is the latest addition to the line of high-grade carbons for which this concern is already so favorably known to the moving picture trade.

This carbon is a new departure in projector carbons, and those who have tried it report results that are at least remarkable, and many of the most progressive operators in New York City have used still stronger terms of praise.

Mr. W. F. Hessel, president of the Charles L. Kiewert Company, explains the advantages of the new carbon as follows: "We market in America the output of the largest high-grade carbon factory in the world. For several years the projector carbons made by this factory have been considered the standard in Germany, but, as the motion picture field was a new one for us, we refrained from entering the American market until we could offer a product of such exceptional merit as to be really sensational. We have been at work on such a carbon, in connection with our factory, for the past two years, and our Bio carbon is the result of our labors. As its name implies, it is designed especially for motion projection. The first feature to which we gave attention was the light. It is perhaps not generally known except by experts that the electric arc, as known to the motion picture trade, is far from the ideal light for projection. In everything except 'throwing' power the calcium light is far superior. In all the best theaters in New York calcium is used exclusively for spotlights, and in the most progressive motion picture houses calcium is generally used for song and stereopticon slide projection. This is due to the steadiness, softness and the pure white color of the calcium. It causes the 'shadows' which give 'life' to the picture to shade naturally into the high lights, and reproduces colors in absolutely natural tints, causing the picture to stand out vividly and naturally.

"We bent our energies toward the perfection of a carbon which should combine the steadiness, softness and whiteness of calcium light with the throwing power of the electric arc. We have been successful to an unexpected degree, and many of our customers have disposed of their calcium lights and use their motion picture lamps with Bio carbons for song and stereopticon slide projection. Of course the houses that can afford both calcium and electric lights are very few, and we mention their experience, not as general practice, but to illustrate the really remarkable qualities of the Bio carbon.

"Another direction in which we wanted improvement was in burning life. The carbons usually sold for motion picture work, are consumed very rapidly, making high carbon expense for the owner and frequent trimming and adjusting for the operator of the machine. With the Bio carbon we find operators running four and five reels more to a trim than they were able to get out of any other 6-inch carbon. This corresponds to a reduction in carbon cost of 25 to 40 per cent., as we are marketing Bio carbons at a price but little greater than that obtained for the best of ordinary carbons. We have also succeeded in reducing the current consumed to produce the same amount of light by about 20 per cent. One point of especial interest is the manner in which Bio carbons stand up under 'forcing.' We have put as high as 100 amperes through a pair of ⅝-inch cored carbons without cracking or splitting. We have also made an innovation in packing that we think will be appreciated by the trade. We pack BIO Carbons in fifties, in a dust-proof box with removable cover, which keeps the carbons clean and orderly. Altogether we feel justified in saying that we have made the only improvement in projector carbons that has been made in the last ten years. This is a pretty broad statement, but everyone who has tried the BIO says the same thing."

Mr. Hessel talks with sincerity and enthusiasm, and we assured him that he would find the moving picture trade open-minded and with a welcome for any improvement, especially one that would enhance the quality of the picture itself, which is the foundation of our industry.

BUSINESS DULL? NOT FOR THE ENTERPRISE.

The usual "dull season" bugaboo has no terrors, it seems, for the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, who report steadily increasing demand for the Motiograph. They are now behind with their orders, and working several nights a week. They certainly are commanding a deal of attention with their intensely practical machine, which three years of grind has proven to be worthy of high consideration. Of course, being New Yorkers, we feel that this town is about the beginning and the end of most things, but we are compelled to admit that some wonderful inventions emanate from Chicago, and one of these startlers is the Motiograph.

CHICAGO AGAIN ON TOP.

Once more New York is defeated by the enterprise of the motion-picture interests of the Windy City. As stated in previous letters, Chicago and the Western cities display more taste in the construction of their theaters, spare no expense to show a clean, decent front, and are not like the exhibitors of the East, fond of an extra display of ugly posters. In the West they believe in a limited number of posters, just enough to advertise the show, and when they use posters they do not imitate New York by nailing them on boards or against the walls, but they place them in neat-looking frames. Some of our Western exhibitors are discarding the long calico signs stretched across the front of a house and replace them by an electric sign, the letters of which can be changed in no time, affording a chance to the exhibitor of having each day a new electric sign to advertise his feature film.

The Cinema Bureau, of Chicago, will cheerfully give all particulars regarding this newly patented electric sign, and will also post the readers on the merits of the new lamp for interior side lights, and of the lamp adjuster and cleaner, an article indispensable to the exhibitor. The lamps of the ceiling can be removed to be cleaned or changed without the help of a stepladder. Some of our Western exhibitors are using gummed letters to make their signs. The gummed letter is a product of Chicago, and affords the means of making an inexpensive yet neat-looking sign in a matter of a few minutes.

The New York "Globe" publishes the following criticism on the pictures from one of its readers:

"I believe I have visited every picture show in the Greater New York. At least I have tried to do so. Some of the shows were absolutely without objection. But there are many that would be immediately closed if Mayor Gaynor could only see them. For example, this scene: First there were several pictures of high life in Paris, when a very handsome and fascinating man receives great attention from ladies of fashion. His wife becomes jealous and hires two ruffians to waylay her husband and to slash his face with knives so that the captivating young man's face is forever disfigured. Of course, when the wife sees him she is filled with remorse, but instead of a divorce a reconciliation takes place. It never occurred to the artist that a fairy could have been introduced who with one magic touch would restore the captivating man to his original beauty!

"I was indignant, and went to the manager. He said the picture had passed the committee to which one of your correspondents has referred. 'The Lord have mercy on the committee.'

"It is urged that children under sixteen are not admitted without their parents or guardians. This does not help matters in the least. You cannot reform the community with the policeman's baton. It must be understood that some of these shows are such as no modest woman can enter. Nearly all these pictures come from Paris. The cowboys of the Wild West have all French faces and 'French morals.'"

Non-Breakable Slides.—The Paris Slide Company, of 932 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, sends us a sample announcement slide that can be subjected to all kinds of heat without breaking. The substance seems to be isinglass and a patent has been applied for. It is the invention of Mr. John Schmittinger, who was formerly press photographer on several Philadelphia newspapers. He has a thorough knowledge of photography, and having had considerable experience with lantern slides set about discovering a means of preventing their breaking in transit or when exposed too long to the heat of the lantern. That he succeeded was well demonstrated before a Moving Picture World representative a few days ago at the Premier Theater, Market street, Philadelphia. Mr. Ellis Parmer, the operator, subjected one of these unbreakable slides to the heat of the lantern for thirty minutes without any defect showing, while a glass slide cracked in one minute and a half. For stock announcement slides Mr. Parmer said that there was nothing to beat the unbreakable slide.

The Ocean Grove Auditorium, Ocean Grove, N. J., is perhaps the largest building of its kind in the world, seating over 12,000 persons. The Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association caters to the most select musical and literary audiences in the country. It may be of interest to the readers of The Moving Picture World that moving pictures, as well as stereopticon exhibitions, are now forming a prominent part of the entertainment. J. H. Hallberg, New York City, installed last week a complete Motiograph moving-picture machine equipment, with the "Hallberg" automatic electric economizer, and the brilliant, flickerless pictures were favorably commented upon. Ocean Grove is also illuminated by twenty Hallberg 4,000-candle-power flaming arc lamps, four of which illuminate the entrances to the large auditorium.

"Moving picture machines should be installed in the Milwaukee public schools," said Superintendent of Schools C. G. Pearse, when told that the school authorities of New York were thinking of equipping all the schools with moving picture apparatus.

"The only thing I can see against it as far as Milwaukee is concerned is the fact that the Board has not the $50,000 necessary for the equipment. The moving picture as a means of education is highly practical."

Nothing has done more toward bringing motion pictures to their present exceeding popularity than the films which show the scenery, people and customs of foreign countries. —Hamilton (Ohio) Journal.

"The Bad Man's Last Deed" (Essanay).—Sometimes even bad men perform heroic deeds, and this one, after being ordered from the county on pain of instant death, helps a young tenderfoot home, but is shot before explanations are possible. The interest lies in the development of character shown and the typical Western setting. Such events were once common in the West, and their reproduction is the preservation in permanent form of scenes which have long since passed away. They are studies of real life, accurately made and adequately presented. As such they deserve more than the usual appreciation accorded pictures of this type.

"On the Threshold" (Gaumont).—A pretty story of the kindness of a child, who offers food to a rough-looking man who comes to the house. Another scene represents the man as a burglar, discovered by the child, who again offers him food. This touches him, and he leaves without taking anything.

"Motoring Among the Cliffs and Gorges of France" (Gaumont).—A beautiful picture of the scenery in some of the French mountains as viewed from a car. The operator has selected his locality with discretion and has made his exposures with intelligence. It affords one an opportunity to view some very pleasing French mountain scenery.

"Max Foils the Police" (Pathe).—A humorous skit representing a man doing some surprising stunts, a la dime-novel detective, closing with some vigorous love-making.

"Riding Feats by Cossacks" (Pathe).—A picture representing some of the marvelous feats on horseback performed by the Cossacks, who vie with the American cowboy in their horsemanship. It is an instructive and entertaining film well worth seeing.

"Saved by the Flag" (Vitagraph).—A dramatic picture representing an episode in South America, where the Stars and Stripes prevent a mob, incited by an incensed discharged employe, from lynching an innocent man. There is something of a thrill in the fact that the flag is really as powerful. It is a phase which is not in evidence in this country, where its protection is a matter of course. The scenery representing South America appears to be reasonably accurate, and there is a spirit and a dash to the picture which makes it attractive and thrilling enough to make the pulses leap in sympathy with the story it tells.

"The Stars and Stripes" (Edison).—Here is a picture that will set every nerve to tingling, will start the blood pulsating more rapidly and will make you want to stand on your seat and cheer with all the vigor you can command. It tells the story of John Paul Jones, that picturesque founder of the American navy, the first to raise the new flag over a United States vessel, and the stirring fight of the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis. The picture throbs with the spirit of '76. You can hear the roar of the guns; you can hear the shouts of the seamen. The great sea fight passes before you and you can acquire a more graphic impression of sea-fighting than you ever had before. There is danger stalking abroad, seeking whom it may devour, and there is love. And, floating over it all, the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of the majesty and sovereignty of a mighty people. One scarcely wants anything more thrilling for Independence Day. Moreover, it is historically correct, and will assist materially in interpreting the life, especially the sea life, of that period.

"Rebellious Betty" (Pathe).—The first of a series of comics intended to disclose the doings of Betty. If she is as vigorous, not to say destructive, in the entire series, few people or anything else will be left when the series is finished. The way she annihilates everything in sight because she can't have her way is a caution. The next in the series will be awaited with interest. Until then it will be unknown what misfortunes will follow her appearance.

"Inside the Earth" (Pathe).—A fanciful film purporting to show the discoveries of two Englishmen who reach the interior of the earth. The array of monsters is quite appalling, and some of the transformations about them are unique. No doubt they are as pleased as they look when they once more reach the surface of the earth.

"The Colonel's Errand" (Kalem).—A thrilling story of Indian fighting on the frontier. Competent judges declare this to be one of the most thrilling stories in the Kalem Company's popular series. It is a strong combination of pathos and adventure—melodramatic, it may be—but teeming with human action and representing at their best the forces which impel men to perform heroic deeds. One acquires a clearer comprehension of what it once meant to live on the frontier, and one is more ready than before to offer respect to the men who fought the battles that made the westward advance of civilization possible.

"Wilson's Wife's Countenance" (Vitagraph).—The man who has sometimes been transfixed with an icy stare will appreciate the beginning of this picture. Here is a farce as immobile as a stone. No matter what is done, it does not change. But a cure is begun, and through a long series of grimaces that would make a harlequin hide himself the countenance is restored to normal flexibility and expression. The last glimpse is natural and pleasing, and represents the work of a powerful restorative administered by a despairing husband.

"Old Glory" (Vitagraph).—Here is a picture which will profoundly stir the patriotic impulses in every person's breast. The conception of the design of the flag is ascribed to Benjamin Franklin, who in a dream sees Freedom pluck the stars from the skies and lay them at his feet. Like all other stories concerning the origin of the flag, this one may be doubted. They even question that Betsy Ross made the first one, or that she ever lived in the little house on Arch street. But it is a pretty fancy, and surely no one is harmed by believing it. Scenes from the various wars, typical of what they stood for, are selected, each one representing the triumph of the flag, until finally, amid a burst of applause, it is seen waving over the land of freedom, the only flag on earth that was never trailed in the dust or hauled down in the ignominy of defeat.

"Muggsy's First Sweetheart" (Biograph).—A delightful comedy depicting the love experiences of Muggsy and Mabel. He has a number of exciting experiences, but is voted a hero after he throws out the National Uplift Committee. All the scenes are funny, and leave no bad impression. It is one of those pictures which is indescribable, but it is none the less appreciated by an audience who likes fun.

"Faith Lost and Won" (Lubin)—A love story set among Western scenes, represented by unusually clear photography. And it teaches the lesson that even though love may be lost, yet love is all powerful and the most beautiful and desirable thing in life, provided only that love be true. Acted with all the ability displayed by the Lubin players, the picture seems to be more than a mere picture and assumes the form of an episode which might have occurred in one's own life.

"The Ruling Passion" (Melies).—A Mexican love story in which chance plays an important part, as it always does in anything a Mexican touches. A horse race in which a horse has been disguised wins a rival's money and a girl. Numerous incidents are interlarded which add to the interest and increase the attention of the audience.

"The Fire Chief's Daughter" (Selig).—Everybody admires the fireman, and there is a halo of romance about the chief of a department which makes him particularly attractive. This story of a fire chief's daughter increases the romance and adds to attractions of the firemen themselves by mixing up a pretty girl with them. The story is told in the Selig way, with elaborate and appropriate stage settings and with scenes which are often too real to be comfortable. But the picture will prove far more attractive than the usual run, perhaps, and the audience will enjoy it, gaining in smaller towns which have no paid department an accurate impression of what it means to be a fireman in a large city.

"The Purgation" (Biograph).—Even a man who is pursuing a criminal course may be restored to honesty and usefulness by some subtle power aroused by what appears sometimes to be a trivial circumstance. Not all are sufficiently strong to stand the test of the purgation which is sure to come. This excellent film tells such a story interestingly and graphically. And, fortunately, the young man, who has worked his way up from thievery to honesty and sobriety, is given another chance when his past is unfortunately discovered. It is not a particularly pleasing story, yet its plain teaching is that men can overcome early evil associations and become useful citizens. It offers numerous suggestions for reformatory work, and, withal, should be a very helpful film.

"The Child's Captive" (Lubin.)—The influence of a child is a theme of which motion-picture producers make the most. Here a little boy captures his father, who is planning to elope with an adventuress, and leads him triumphantly back to his mother. The inference is too plain to pass unheeded. It makes plain the ascendency of the child in all situations of this character. And it teaches other lessons equally important and quite as plain.

"The Runaway Dog" (Pathe).—A rough-house picture, which includes an exciting chase a la "Murchison's Pup." All those who are upset by the flying dog and man unite in belaboring the unfortunate individual, while the mischief-making dog escapes scot free to his former master.

"The Rhine from Cologne to Bingen" (Pathe).—Almost as good as a trip down the river and infinitely less arduous. All the ancient castles, each surrounded with scores of legends; all the incomparable scenery, and all the misty folklore, accumulated during the ages, are embodied in these pictures. With photography unusually clear and made from viewpoints which betray the work of an artist, this film is one of the most notable in the long list of travel films issued by the Pathes. It would be impossible to overpraise it.

"Go West, Young Woman, Go West" (Selig).—A bit of comedy illustrating how Cupid disturbed arrangements in Mrs. Kelly's boarding house, as the cowboys married off one after another of her cooks. Finally an actor accepts the position, and just as trouble was camping on everybody's trail she marries him, thus retaining the cook and saving the day. The complications are funny, and the picture is certain to prove popular everywhere because of its absurdity.

"The Tale of Two Coats" (Edison).—A long, angular man in a chubby man's dress suit, and vice versa. A Governor's reception, with a typical messenger boy to perform the original mixing. Perhaps further explanation would be superfluous. When the two individuals thus attired face each other at the reception it is perhaps needless to say that everybody laughs. And well they might. It is an unroariously funny situation, and funny, indeed, is the scene when they meet. "The Tale of Two Coats" is a laugh-maker.

"Equal to the Emergency" (Edison).—Tact on the part of this young wife prevents a serious disturbance which might have ended in the permanent estrangement of a rich uncle and a loss of all the expectations which had been entertained from time immemorial. The complications are amusing and cannot fail to provoke a full measure of laughter. Stories which turn upon the loss of a cook are always funny, and when they include, too, the danger of estranging a wealthy uncle the story becomes even more interesting. The acting and photography are alike satisfactory, and add their share to the attractiveness of the story.

"The Clink of Gold" (Gaumont).—The clink of gold and the changes it makes in the behavior of people was never more graphically or eloquently told than they are here. A quantity of supposed gold entirely changes the attitude of a man and wife toward an old gentleman. The denouement which shows them receiving only a stone instead of money is very gratifying. Without exception, those who see the picture will say they got only their deserts.

"Life in Senegal, Africa" (Gaumont).—A picture of a little-known region, representing the people at work in their various industries. Their methods are crude, but the results seem to be reasonably satisfactory. The visit to the school, which closes the picture, is interesting. It is a unique touch of life to see the little black boys at work on their studies.

"A Boarding-School Romance" (Vitagraph).—A lively story centering around love-making at a boarding school. The teachers are cleverly trapped by a flashlight photograph of them doing some spooning themselves. The difficulty is adjusted by exchanging the telltale photograph for the privilege of meeting, and then the two couples stray away, each to follow their own inclinations to make love. A very cleverly conceived plot and well worked out.

"The Other Johnson" (Essanay).—May be many who see this faithful, though humorous, study of human nature, will wish that they, too, might be as easily rid of objectionable hangers-on. Money, or the announcement that one is going to have it, brings a more or less serious and disturbing train of consequences in its wake. The picture presents this phase of the subject emphatically and the situation becomes complicated. The telegram announcing that it was not this Johnson, but some other, cleared the air and the house almost instantly. People have little use for poverty, but there is an attraction about money that is irresistible and causes them to do all sorts of queer things to obtain possession of even a little.

"The Hero Engineer" (Kalem).—Here is something that will make you want to stand up and cheer first the engineer who dares the strikers to carry the superintendent to see his dying child; next the wife who fights with the mob as they attempt to burn the trestle over which the engine must pass on its return; again the engineer as he rushes into the smoke, and lastly the soldiers who put the mob to flight. A touch is added which seems to prove that justice will be done in the capture by the superintendent of the agitator who led the mob in their attack on the trestle. Melodramatic? Yes, but human passion is so graphically presented that all alike must agree that the picture possesses unusual interest. The Kalem actors are particularly strong and sympathetic in a piece of this character. The mechanical improvement in the films adds materially to the attractiveness of the pictures.

"Love Ye One Another" (Pathe).—Once in a while a picture appears on the screen which reaches so far down into human life that it seems to search one's heart. After seeing this picture, and considering the lessons it teaches, one is disposed to accord it the title of the greatest picture of the week, great because it depicts simply, but graphically, the weakness and selfishness of men. An unfortunate wayfarer is turned away from one home after another where comfort and plenty prevail. Who can deny the accusation? He reviles the cross, but Christ appears to him and his hardened heart softens. And then he gives all he had, his life, to rescue one from death who refused him food. Who can describe, or give utterance to the emotions which this picture arouses? Not for weeks has there been one like it. Not for weeks has a picture appeared which illustrated so plainly and unmistakably the indifference of men to another's suffering. Perhaps never before has one appeared which so clearly demonstrated the selfishness of men in dealing with others less fortunate than themselves. It gives expression to the feeling that the unfortunate have no place in the great scheme of the world. It impresses one with the old worldwide belief in man's inhumanity to man. And at the end, the unfortunate gives up his life, a sacrifice much too frequently offered and much too often required. This is a great sermon upon a great text, and should be shown in the uttermost parts of the country. It cannot help arousing emotions which through indifference have been permitted to become dormant. Through its agency great good should be accomplished.

"A Russian Spy" (Urban).—A war story in which a spy takes a prominent part. The moonlight reconnoitering expedition is a good piece of photography. It is a dramatic moment when the maidservant who saved the spy is taken away to be shot, but is saved by the timely arrival of the friendly force. The revel of the officers, including the dance, is an excellent piece of work. Moreover it illustrates a dance but little known in this country.

"Tropical Java of the South Sea Islands" (Urban).—Whenever an outdoor picture by this house appears on the screen one immediately prepares to be taken through picturesque scenery, no matter where the picture may have been taken. This is no exception. The picturesque life of the people is clearly depicted, and the scenery is reproduced with a fidelity to the original which makes it particularly interesting. The operator understood perfectly the selection of his viewpoint and the manipulation of his camera. The result is a picture which affords an excellent idea of what life in Java is like, increasing one's knowledge of the people, their manners and customs.

INDEPENDENT.

"Charles the Fifth" (Lux).—A historic film purporting to represent the episode of Charles the Fifth's attempt to secure the throne for himself. Poison, imprisonment, madness are prominent features of the pictures. Then enters remorse, which influences the usurper to relinquish his plans and release the imprisoned persons. Undoubtedly such events actually occurred, but it must be admitted that they do not leave an altogether pleasant impression of the rulers of the early time. The horrors suggested are even worse than than those actually represented. One may not escape from the subtle influence of such films without an exertion of the will.

"A Quiet Pipe" (Lux).—A bet is proposed as to which of two friends shall smoke the most tobacco in a given time. Clouds of smoke issue from the house, and very many other extremely funny things occur.

"The Ranchman's Simple Son" (Bison).—A story of the exploit of an idiot who saved a kidnapped girl from the hands of a maddened cowboy. One need not agree with all the film represents, for example, this kidnapping of a girl, but one may without exaggeration agree that it possesses some degree of novelty in making a simple boy its hero. Aside from this, it may be called commonplace.

"The Flag of His Country" (Thanhouser).—A love story based upon what purports to be the division of a husband and wife by the late war. He chose his flag instead of his Southern wife and went to war. Long years afterward they are reunited through their grandchild losing herself and her grandfather finding her. There is much of pathos and much of loyalty, some of it mistaken, perhaps, but none the less earnest. Eventually they come together with only one flag over them, united like their country.

"Gone to Coney Island" (Thanhouser).—Not much further explanation is needed. Those who have been there and those who have heard of it know what it means. Perhaps nothing further is required.

"Faust" (Eclair).—A presentation of Goethe's famous tragedy which will appeal to lovers of the drama as an unusually accurate interpretation of the great play. Its principal theme, the triumph of love over evil, and Faust's hastening to the prison, where Marguerite, restored briefly to reason, dies in his arms, is admirably managed and constitutes an entrancing piece of dramatic work. The three principal characters are admirably acted, each one performing his or her part in a manner that indicates the most careful and elaborate preparation. In dramas of this type there is always some theme around which it all centers, and in this instance the real feature of the play has never for a moment been lost. The result is that one acquires a deeper comprehension of the play and what it means, with a more searching analysis of the fundamental elements of human life upon which it is based.

"A Game for Two" (Imp).—Whether or not a woman could reasonably be jealous of a husband's male friend is a question which might have to be left to circumstances. However, the mix-up here shown is rendered first humorous because the wife becomes jealous, and next serious when she begins bestowing unwelcome attentions upon the friend for the purpose of driving him away. Unfortunately, the husband is not particularly enamored of the Romeo stunt of his friend and begins some uncomfortable shooting about the place. But, happily, the tangles are all unraveled and peace once more folds her wings and rests within the household. It is very exciting while it lasts, however, and promises in some phases to result in a disagreeable disturbance.

"For Her Son's Sake" (Centaur).—A story of a will, with a mother's attempt to obtain property for a son. There are complications, but ultimately a hidden will is discovered which makes everything right. Melodramatic in structure, this story holds the attention of the audience and creates a good deal of interest as fresh complications accumulate which must be unraveled. Acting and photography are alike satisfactory.

"She Would Be a Business Man" (Centaur).—A humorous illustration of what might occur if a husband and wife changed places. The wife discovered that business is not all a summer holiday, and the husband, struggling with the many petty annoyances of the housewife, is quite ready to yield the place to her when she returns, humiliated and repentant, and acknowledges her mistake. Perhaps this picture, intended as a bit of fun, will be the means of restoring to sanity some who are now dissatisfied with their lot in life. It may be it is funny, but it is really serious, nevertheless.

"The Sons of the Minister" (Great Northern).—A film possessing dramatic power and heart interest, both developed in an unusual degree. The actors have seized upon every advantage offered, and have made a picture which will please everyone fortunate enough to see it.

"Catherina, Duchess of Kuisa" (Itala).—A film of interest and dramatic power, though it will probably prove most attractive as a picture of another age and clime. It is acted with intelligence and discretion, and will no doubt prove popular with the mass of theater-goers.

"The Man Behind the Curtain" (Powers).—A dramatic and unusual picture, showing how a man gambled away a large sum of his employer's money and the desperate, though eventually successful, means he took to regain possession of it. There are two strongly dramatic scenes, one when the wife discovers the writing and the other when the boy pleads with the gambler to give back the money, and he finally does it.

"The Lady Doctor" (Powers).—The experience of a pretty young woman doctor among the cowboys. The funny things they do to cure their imaginary ills would win laughs from a stone man.

"Saved from Himself" (Defender).—An ambitious title for a moral film, having as the basis of its story the excessive smoking of cigarettes, which leads to a whole lot of other ills, like they do in the Sunday-school books. However, there is a happy love match, and the cigarette fiend returns, the victory won, saved from himself, or snatched from the burning.

"Trapped by His Own Mark" (Capitol).—A masterly detective story, in which the mystery is unfolded so gradually and subtly that it is scarcely recognized until the denouement, and the guilty one is indeed trapped by his own mark.

"The King of the Beggars" (Eclair).—An interesting story of the double life of the villainous Duke of Amblois. Along with it runs the thread of a pretty love story, with the lovers thwarted in their plans for a time, but the accidental death of the duke after it was discovered that he was the king of the beggars causes the girl's father to cease his objections, and the picture ends pleasantly. It is an elaborate bit of work, and the sudden change from the dingy underground beggars' quarters to the magnificent apartments above is as surprising as it is unexpected. It is one of the best films from this house in a considerable time.

"The Fallen Idol" (Imp).—A graphic representation of what sometimes befalls country girls with pretty faces who follow the lure of the city. This is so true to life that girls who are about to leave the country for the city should look at it well before deciding to follow their inclinations. Some types of life in a city are best shunned, and, unfortunately, country girls are considered legitimate prey to those who live in these particular circles.

"A Soldier's Sacrifice" (Nestor).—A pathetic war picture, graphically telling the story of a desertion, a desertion that most men would say was amply justified. Then came the long years of wandering, the return and the dramatic meeting with the daughter, and finally the answer of the last roll-call. Ah, well, one sees the film, realizes the import of it and wonders why. It is a question beyond answering, a question which never can be answered. It embodies too much of the human side of men.

"The Ghetto Seamstress" (Yankee).—A transcript of Ghetto life, graphically representing the hard conditions under which those who flee from foreign oppression and cruelty are often forced by circumstances to live. This story has a pretty ending. The man may be thankless and forget the true-hearted little woman who toils early and late to insure him a future, but he is brought to a realizing sense of his error and marries her after all, though he doesn't know it when the ceremony is performed. As a character study the film is valuable, and it should afford a new impression with respect to the downtrodden and cruelly treated peoples who come to America.

"A Sinner's Sacrifice" (Bison).—The story of a broken home and the attempt of the woman responsible for wrecking it to right the wrong when she discovers the consequences of her folly. The picture has much of sorrow in it, much that shows how hard the conditions of life are under some circumstances and what a train of difficulties often follow in the wake of one sinful action.

"On the Border" (Powers).—A Western picture having a touch of Mexican life in it and a bit of delightful love comedy which represents a brave fighter as embarrassed when it comes to telling a girl that he loves her. The most interesting feature is the exciting chase on horseback. All the riders are experts and the horses are real bronchos, and the chase is almost hair-raising in its exciting features. The entire picture is admirably done, and the film is all that could be asked, dramatically, pictorially and photographically.

"Gone to Coney Island" (Thanhouser).—It is useless to describe this film. The very spirit of Coney Island has been caught and reproduced in the picture. That is all there is of it. He who has seen Coney will appreciate this. He who has never seen it can rest assured that the motion picture is bringing him as much of the real Coney as it is possible to reproduce in a life photograph.

"Booming Business" (Thanhouser).—The laughable story of a young man who sought to make his stationary business grow. It didn't grow, but some of his attempts to make it grow are inexpressibly funny.

"The Little German Band" (Atlas).—The lively experiences of a party of men who became imbued with the mistaken idea that they could extract sweet concord of sounds from brass instruments. What was done to them along the way by various individuals who failed to appreciate their efforts is graphically told in a number of amusing scenes. It is a comic full of action and creating no end of laughter as it proceeds.

"Maneuvers of the New York Police" (Atlas).—A picture which should please New York people. To see 5,000 men maneuvering as these men do is worth much. While everyone is pleased to see marching men, those who know the New York police force best, the New York residents, will accord the highest praise to this excellent picture. It will give others an opportunity to form some idea of the most wonderful police force in the world.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Transparent Screen.—Portsmouth, Ohio, writes: "After embarking in the moving-picture business last November, I sent for sample copies of the various journals devoted to that branch of business, and was quickly convinced that The Moving Picture World was 'IT.' I enjoy reading it, and am always anxious for the arrival of the next number. As the editor of the Operator's Column is always ready to assist, I take the liberty of asking a little help. Won't you please answer the following: (1) Is it possible to get a good picture with machine in rear of curtain? (2) Would a special curtain be necessary for that purpose? (3) Would you recommend showing that way? (4) Would the solid white wall be best? (5) ——— ———?"

Many thanks for your good opinion of The World and The Column. May both continue to merit your approbation. (1) Yes. (2) A screen of bleached cheesecloth, or, better still, bleached, very thin muslin. The effect is much improved if the screen can be kept wet. (3) I would not, except under circumstances practically compelling it. The machine must be set lower than the curtain, so as to throw up, else the bright spot of the lens will show. (4) I don't exactly understand. You could not project through a solid wall, naturally. Perhaps you mean would it be best for projecting in the regular way. If so, then I would answer that, provided it be white plaster, kept perfectly clean and white; the writer prefers it to any other screen save possibly some recent inventions with which he is not as yet well enough acquainted to pass final judgment. (5) As to your fifth query, I think, in view of the excessive cost of the article, I would proceed with due caution and care, being very certain that its installation will be of corresponding benefit to your house. More than this I would not care to say at this time. Excuse brevity of answers, as it is Fourth-of-July time and the editor has been making the eagle scream.

A Tough Proposition.—Albion, N. Y., writes: "Have an Ullman coil on 60-cycle alternating current. Arrangements are being made to change to 25-cycle, the voltage remaining 110. Will it be necessary to get a new resistance device, or will the old one work satisfactorily on different cycle? Do low-voltage transformers save much in current bills as compared to the Ullman coil? How does the light compare in steadiness and brilliancy? Kindly reply through the valuable Operator's Column, Moving Picture World."

Albion, you certainly are what is termed in the language of the street "up against it." I am sorry to say that no matter what device you may use you will not be able to get good light from 25-cycle current. It will be flickery and very hard to control. At least I never heard of anyone getting good projection light from 25-cycle current, and I personally would not try it. You might put in a motor-generator set and generate direct volt current, but I believe I am correct in saying that practically all small 25-cycle motors are of the induction type, and they in turn would be hard to handle. Sorry to speak thus discouragingly, Albion, but think it better to "put you wise" to what is coming. If you cannot possibly get any other current, and there is business to warrant it, you might consider the advisability of installing a gasoline engine-generator set. Now as to the Ullman coil: I am not acquainted with that particular coil, but, as I have said in these columns several times, I don't consider choke coils (which I take it the Ullman is) as a satisfactory resistance at all. I consider the low-voltage transformer as distinctly better in every way. You will have to have your coil rewound for 25-cycle, I think, or rather I think it can be rewound for that cycle. You have my sympathy with that 25-cycle proposition, but I'm glad it's not me. I very much doubt if any reputable low-voltage transformer manufacturer will undertake to supply you with a 25-cycle transformer without first telling you it won't give good results.

From West Virginia (Name of town suppressed by request).—In a recent issue an operator stated that if he framed his picture at low speed at high speed it was out about six inches at the bottom. I believe this is caused by worn teeth on the sprocket. When running slow the tension springs prevent the film from running down on the teeth from above, but when the speed is increased the rapid motion causes it to run down until the top of the sprocket holes catch on the teeth. This, I think, would cause such an effect on the curtain as was described. It also causes flicker. As to focusing projection lens, there is no need of a piece of mica marked with cross lines such as you described some time since. Just throw the light through empty aperture and focus until edges of aperture are clear cut and not blurred."

Well, at least West Virginia has ideas, and I always admire a man with ideas, even though I may think the same to be wrong. While worn sprocket teeth might help matters along some, still that the effect is due to tension spring pull is demonstrated to the writer almost every day during his work in inspecting new machines. A brand new machine has no worn sprocket teeth, yet when a machine happens to fall heir to a weak pair of springs (yes, they vary considerably, even when new), and I speed it up in testing, up goes the picture from the bottom. However, as I said, worn teeth might help some also. As to the mica, I have not found the edges of the aperture nearly so accurate a guide in focusing as is the mica strip; also the mica strip tells you instantly when there is a drop of oil or anything on the lens, and it is a constant test as to the absolute accuracy of your lens.

Shocking.—New York City, N. Y., writes: "I am using alternating current, and every time I touch the asbestos-covered wire I get a shock, even though I am not grounded. Is this caused by the alternations of the current? Why has the Hallberg economizer six wires? Can I attach a spot-light to the same economizer with which the motion-picture lamp is connected?"

If you mean when you are standing on an insulating mat and touching nothing but one wire of the circuit, then it would be utterly impossible for you to get a shock. You must, therefore, be either grounded or making a short out of your body, thus: Suppose you touched both asbestos-covered wires and the insulation was poor! You would get a shock, certainly. Suppose you stood on an iron floor to which one line of the circuit was grounded and you touched the other wire where its insulation was poor. Naturally you would get a shock. But what's the use guessing! Either you are grounded or you in some way form a "short" when you touch the wire. Just how it is done I can't say, but one or the other is bound to be correct. No, alternations have nothing to do with shocks except to make them more unpleasant when you get them. As to the economizer, the two wires apart are the line wires. One of the other four is the "permanent connection," to which one lamp wire is always attached. To which one of the other three your lamp wire is attached will depend how many amperes the economizer will deliver at the arc.

The Editor Has a Defender.—New York City, N. Y., in an excellent and sensible letter sets forth certain views, incidentally ladling out a few kind words for the editor of The Column. The letter runs as follows: "Might I suggest that the genial operator who has given you so admirable (?) a roasting has missed his calling and should be in a private box on Monday, criticizing the show, instead of up in the booth all week, cranking! Seriously, I am sure all operators will agree that your reply contains a great deal of truth, as also in a measure do the accusations of the worthy operator, Mr. Garvin. No, not as regards yourself—certainly not—for the aid you have given operators through your Column is certainly appreciated by every man who really desires to excel. But the references he makes to conditions I am sure represent the state of affairs in a great many houses of this city. Your suggestion that we have allowed ourselves to be thus imposed upon is but too correct. But how to put the thing right again presents a difficult problem. On every hand one finds complaint, but there is nothing practical done to remedy things. In the union are a number of men, and a still larger number remain outside. The non-union men are not so so much for the reason that they are opposed as from the apparent lack of life in that organization. There seems to be nothing practical done to show that such an organization exists at all in New York City. Naturally, a man with no previous experience of unions hesitates about investing money (of which the average operator is by no means overburdened at best) in something that to all human appearances is very nearly a candidate for the burial services and sexton. Let some energetic person (if I may suggest such a one as yourself) interest himself in directing the affairs of the union, so that it begins to evince some signs of life, and I am positive there would very soon be a wholesale rush to the union ranks. Given a strong organization, I am sure that eventually the elimination of the evils which at present make things so unpleasant would follow. Why in the world should an operator have to put in the morning hanging around a film exchange? Isn't the daily grind enough without having to become an errand boy? Should there not be some arrangement for the man to get off at least for half an hour to eat his supper in peace, instead of in pieces, as at present? Is not a real operator worth at least $18 for six days and $24 for seven? Should there not be a little consideration shown for the operator in the way of ample room, ventilation, etc., etc., in the booth? These and a host of other wrongs are waiting to be righted! You, Mr. Richardson, successfully solve our problems in regard to mechanical and projection troubles. Is it too much out of your sphere to suggest some practical means whereby something might be done to improve conditions in the operating rooms of this great city? It certainly is a queer business when, as a whole, we are dissatisfied; yet no one stirs to assume the leadership. Will not some valiant one step forth and lead the hosts to victory?

"ONE OF THE SHEEP."

This is but one of many letters received, the perusal of which would doubtless give friend Garvin an enlarged idea of the number of friends the editor of The Column has scattered over the landscape of America. I give this letter space first, because it contains excellent ideas; second, because it is from a New York City operator, working in Manhattan. To begin at the end and work backward, the operator should not be obliged to go to the exchange at all, much less "hang around it." He should by all means have time to eat a decent meal, though, as I have before pointed out, this presents decided difficulties to the manager who simply won't shut down half an hour or an hour. Nevertheless, difficulty or none, the operator should, and must, have time to eat. He is actually almost human, Mr. Manager, whether you believe it or not. In Chicago, for instance, operators as a rule get $18 to $22.50 for a night show only. Surely your figures are reasonable enough to satisfy any man who is sane, bearing in mind the fact that most New York houses run from 11 to 11 continuous, though most of them, I believe, have two operators, or an operator and helper. Yes, some consideration should be shown in the matter of ventilation, ample room, etc., etc. But, after all, what is the use in saying that this or that should be. No one but a money-mad lunatic would dream of saying they should not be; but what we say is not what counts in this old world. It is what we do. Managers are not running a charity bazar. Speaking broadly, they don't, as a rule, care a thinker's d——um—er, well, they don't care anything at all about the operator's troubles, and will give him only such improved conditions as they are compelled to, and no more. So long as Mr. Operator consents to get the film he will have to get it. So long as he will eat his meals "in pieces," as was so aptly put, he will have to do it. If they consent to put up with a three-by-six iron-lined dry goods box in lieu of an operating room, that is what will be handed them. And now as to the remedy: It is suggested that the writer interest himself in the affairs of the union. For various most excellent reasons he could not for a moment consider such a proposal at all. But he does most heartily hope some Moses will arise and lead the children (I am sometimes tempted to think a large proportion of them really are children) out of bondage. That the work of unionizing New York City operators is not pushed with even a decent semblance of vigor I believe everyone knows and will admit, save possibly those directly responsible for such a state of affairs. But allow me to suggest to "One of the Sheep" that the thing to do is get into the union, where your voice will count, and fight from within, rather than from outside. If things are not being run in a satisfactory way (and the writer believes there might well be material improvement), the dissatisfied ones can never hope to remedy anything by remaining outside the organization. Get in, neighbor, and then proceed to start something. That would be my way of doing it. The writer is willing to at any time do any reasonable thing in bettering conditions for New York City operators, but he could not consistently even offer to do anything at all involving the union without first receiving an invitation from that organization. But he is sure the union contains able men who can do the work so imperatively needed without his advice or assistance. Let them get real busy, real soon!

Operators Wanted.—New York (name of town suppressed) sent the following telegram last week: "F. H. Richardson: Please wire immediately, my expense, names of two or three operators, with machine, to take position for summer months. One must report Friday noon. State terms. Men must be careful and reliable. Upon favorable reply will either wire money for fare or refund upon arrival. References, United Film Rental Company, Troy, or First National Bank here."

After seeking vainly for reliable operators owning machines I was obliged to wire that they could not be had and recommended him to try a certain exchange in Albany. My reason for publishing this telegram is to show what sort of requests come occasionally. It might be well for operators who can prove their competency to leave their names and addresses with the editor of the Column, together with 'phone number at which they can be reached. It might lead to nothing, but at the least it would cost nothing, and there you are!

Use Salt.—Washington, D. C., sends in a drawing, together with the following: "Have been reading the matter concerning 550-volt water resistance. The men seem to have trouble regulating their light. By placing a tablespoonful of salt in the water before starting and adding until you get proper light it will be found, I think, the trouble will largely disappear."

If it has not been stated that salt should be added to the bath of a water rheostat, it certainly should have been. Salt is essential to the best results with water resistance, and the writer, on ordinary voltage, used to dump in a half pound to the barrel. Many thanks for calling attention to the matter, Washington. The drawing sent is of a water rheostat, in which the water is contained in a box, the iron electrodes being suspended from movable rods, which may be slid along grooves, bringing the electrodes nearer each other or separating them, thus controlling the current. A very convenient arrangement, indeed.

KINEMACOLOR MACHINE.

By F. H. Richardson.

Last week I witnessed a demonstration of the Kinemacolor (natural color films) films and machine. After the demonstration I made close examination of the projection mechanism, for the especial benefit of The Column readers. Of the films themselves it is not my intention to speak more than to say that they were very wonderful and very beautiful, especially the bouquets of flowers which were reproduced in amazing exactitude as to colors. Even the most delicate shades of the yellow and the pink rose were there, while the gorgeous plumage of the tiger lily lost nothing at all of its brilliance through being a mere projected photograph.

The machine itself is of massive build, heavy and strong, and runs at exactly twice the speed of the ordinary machine, being operated by motor. Its intermittent movement is of the "beater" type familiar to old-time operators (if anyone may be termed "old time" in a business but little more than ten years old). The beater consists in a roller which revolves on its spindle, the spindle itself revolving and being in the form of a driven crank. The roller is where the handle of the crank would be, and as it is whirled it strikes the film each revolution and jerks it down exactly the width of one picture.

The beater operates at the point where the lower loop would be in the star and cam machine. The sprockets are of brass and are 1½ inches in diameter and each sprocket has two idle rollers about ¾ inch in diameter. (I am guessing at these diameter measurements, but guess it's about right). The tension shoes are three in number on each side, something the same type as is used on the Viascope machine, with a total length up and down of about 6½ inches. The automatic fire-shutter governor is probably 3 inches in diameter when extended, sets upright and is exactly the type of tripod ball-revolving governor used on stationary engines. The magazines are of cast aluminum, fully ⅛ inch in thickness, round in shape. The whole head weighs approximately 100 pounds. The lamphouse is roomy, and the lamp is certainly a beauty and a joy forever to the operator. It is built to carry up to 100 amperes continuously. In ordinary work, with large picture, about eighty amperes of current is necessary to secure proper curtain brilliancy, since naturally the color screens and great film speed operate to cut down the illumination. Five-eighths to three-quarter carbons are used. Just in front of the aperture is the revolving color screen which produces the color effect. It is divided into six sections, two of which are filled with red, two with green and two are empty, permitting the white light to pass. This screen may be removed and, by running the machine at half speed, it becomes a projector of ordinary films in the usual way and with the usual, ordinary black-and-white effect. The table of the machine has legs and braces of 1½ by ⅜ inch flat iron, and has, or at least should have, practically no vibration at all. And now I believe this completes as good a description as the writer can give from one somewhat casual examination of the mechanism. The exceedingly high speed, of course, causes the machine to give forth a considerable humming sound as it runs. This would have to be expected. All in all, the Kinemacolor projector is a finely built mechanism, simple to thread and operate and of massive construction. Any good operator could run them after slight instruction—provided he is already a real operator.

THE WEEK IN CHICAGO.

The attention of all has been drawn toward the successful exploitation of the "Sane Fourth" in Chicago, where every year heretofore the list of dead and wounded has been appalling. This is probably the best and most sensible move that the "Windy City" has ever made, and one which has cut down to a great extent the sad portion of the celebration of so great an event, which should be kept in more sacred a fashion than has been the usual custom.

All large and enterprising picture houses were busy all last week in the preparation of appropriate offerings to satisfy the most fastidious patriotic tastes. Patriotic subjects were bountiful and inspired such as saw them beyond imagination. Was not this a far better celebration than the blowing off of many fingers, which in many cases cause the suffering of the innocent rather than the real "foolhardy" patriots?

Sweltering under the terrific rays of Old Sol, Chicago's picture lovers appear in their usual places nightly to witness the day's releases. It is evident that such theaters that take into consideration the fact that the patron's comfort is the most essential part of the real "Show Business" do not lose much of their patronage during the hot season, and if anything increase their receipts. Some people will ask "Why?" Here is one answer: In the first place, the regular theater-goer cannot keep away from some sort of amusement, no matter what the weather conditions might be, and as practically all of the larger theaters in the loop have closed their doors for a brief period during the Summer, this lets the picture house, with the Summer parks, have full sway at the populace. It is customary in nearly all families to take an evening constitutional after mealtime, and as it is nearly impossible to take much of a stroll without passing some picture theater, these people are invariably attracted, and this attraction suggests a slight diversion, which they thoroughly enjoy under the exhilarating breeze of a humming electric fan. The "Little House Around the Corner" seems to be in evidence this season, for it is close to home, and one can witness a full drama, a rattling good comedy or educational and travel subject all in the few minutes that it takes to run the celluloid belt through the projecting machine, eliminating all the tiresome dialogue.

Now comes the point which is most important of all, to entice the people, or rather offer an enticing front that will draw them into the house. Many schemes have been launched and sunk in the storm of summer heat, but here is one that was suggested by two of Chicago's large playhouses—namely, the Garrick and the Lyric Theaters, under the direction of the Messrs. Shubert. In the lobby of these theaters was placed a fairly large-sized table, constructed and fitted to hold several hundred pounds of ice, with a large electric fan behind this open refrigerator blowing the iced air either into the house or out on the street. Sufficient verdure and foliage should be placed in and about the entrance of the theater to make a fitting background and give the house as cool and inviting an appearance as possible. With this advertised cooling comfort, who could resist the temptation of tasting of the delight? Ask yourself this question, then do as your own mind suggests. We are all human, and seeing is believing, so the saying goes, which will direct you on the right track for the hot dog days of Summer.

All dark-colored decorations should be avoided where possible; decorate your ice table with some light material, and, if the expense will warrant, have paper-mache icebergs made to cover it. Dress your attendants in white uniforms, which will add materially to the cool appearance of your theater. These uniforms are reasonable and can be easily cleaned and, if carefully taken care of, can be used for several seasons.

The foregoing are merely timely hints, suggested from personal opinions and observations, and are herewith given in hope of helping some exhibitors who may be on the lookout for something that will hold their patronage during the Summer months against the opposition of the Summer parks.

"Old Glory," at the Orpheum, was most beautifully presented by the aid of the illustrious Mr. King and his accompanying orchestra. Each and every scene of the wonderful Vitagraph subject was exactly and patriotically brought out and won for it a hearty applause. This is one of the patriotic subjects that is specially adapted for Independence Day celebrations.

Mr. McMillan, who represents the Carson Films in Chicago, has moved from his old site at 225 Dearborn street, and has taken up his quarters at 79 Clark street.

B. G. Uher & Co., who have long been well known to the profession in general, have recently entered the souvenir line, and are offering a most tempting line of appropriate novelties for use in picture houses.

B. E. Clements returned last week from 'Frisco, where he has been spending the last month in conference with his associates, Messrs. Hester and O'Day.

The following Chicago houses have changed hands: John L. Davenport has purchased the theater at 6334 Cottage Grove avenue, Albert Jund the one at 714 East Forty-seventh street, and Henry J. Evon the one at 3303 Halstead street.

On East Fifty-fifth street there are two houses which show their pictures very well. The Madison, at Fifty-fifth street and Madison avenue, is a house of the average size, in which the pictures are well projected. Mr. Hunter, the manager, shows only two reels, as he does not believe in too long a show. These are changed daily, although Mr. Hunter says that he would much rather change only three times a week.

A block west of this, at the Woodlawn, the pictures are fairly well projected. They are marred, however, by the presence of several unshaded red sidelights. Red light shining on a picture will injure it more than any other color, while at the same time it does not fulfill its proper function of lighting the aisles and seats. On the other hand, green light does not seem to affect the picture, even though unshaded green lamps may be quite close to the screen, and it lacks the irritating effect on the eyes which red light has.

The Bonaventure, Sixty-first and Halsted streets, is another house which is showing its films attractively. Mr. E. Mr. Cooke, the owner, is an amateur photographer, and was drawn into the moving-picture field because of his interest in photography and its relation to the pictures. He shows the films as photographs because they are photographs, and the projection at the Bonaventure is much better than the average. The operator there, too, possesses considerable judgment. He was showing the Biograph film of the "Three Fishers," and when he came to the sub-titles, consisting of the verses of the poem, he ran the machine very slowly, giving the audience a chance to easily read them. Mr. Cooke is very optimistic as to the future of the moving picture. He expresses his belief that its course has only just begun, and, further, that it will last as long as people have eyes to see them.

The Ideal Theater, at Sixty-third and Halsted streets, shows its pictures very well. The most noticeable thing about this theater is its operating room, which is very well designed. In the first place, it is very large and roomy; it is entered by a door from a ladder, instead of the usual trapdoor. The projection opening and operator's window are both large, each of them being about a foot square, so that the operator does not have to strain his eyes to see what kind of picture he has on the screen. The back of the booth contains two windows, hinged at the bottom, which allow of ample ventilation, as they give an opening when down of about two by twelve feet. At the same time the operator is screened from the people on the street, since the windows ar of opaque glass and are hinged at the bottom, opening outward. Under such working conditions it might be expected of the operator that he will do good work, and he does. The picture on the screen is well lighted and steady, and is not hurried. The theater itself is one of the first in Englewood, and has a nearly flat floor, though the picture can be easily seen from all seats.

FIVE NEW YORK EXHIBITORS FINED.

In sentencing five proprietors of moving picture shows for admitting minors without guardians, Justice Hoyt assured the men that they and their like would hereafter receive the maximum penalty in Special Sessions. The Board of Education has been vigorous in its complaints of late. Four of the men were fined $50 each, and Morris Bergoffen, of 482 Third avenue, was fined $100. The maximum penalty includes imprisonment.

"BECKET."

Splendid Historical Film by the Vitagraph Company.

"Becket" is the title of one of the most notable poems by the late Lord Tennyson. It was turned into a play in which the late Sir Henry Irving made one of his greatest successes. Four years ago, Henry Irving, said to be the greatest actor since the time of David Garrick, died in somewhat sudden and pathetic circumstances. The last words that he uttered were those in the character of Becket when, just before his death by martyrdom, he exclaimed: "Into Thy hands, Oh Lord, into Thy hands!" The moment that the Vitagraph Company announced the release of "Becket," we were curious to see what sort of production would be made of it. For we know Canterbury Cathedral, the scene of the martyrdom, as intimately as we know Twenty-third street, New York. We have visited Becket's shrine there. Becket, it may also be said, is one of the saints of the Roman calendar. Moreover, he was not merely a great priest; he was a great champion of popular liberty against kingly oppression. To this day his name is revered by all as a monumental figure of the medieval ages.

The story of his martyrdom is briefly told. He was made Archbishop of Canterbury, and in that capacity he protested against the anti-clerical tendencies of his King, Henry II., who also is renowned in history for, amongst other things, the possession of a somewhat notable affinity in the person of Fair Rosamond. One of Becket's priests who objected to the presence of this lady in the Royal household, was promptly killed by the haughty Henry, who, altogether, was rather a bad lot.

The Vitagraph Company have worked out this interesting bit of English history with, to our mind, surprising success. We are shown in the film, Becket's rise to the Archiepiscopate. We are also shown in a dramatic part of the film, illustrated in the accompanying cut, how he humiliated himself by taking flagellation at the hands of King and clergy on his appointment to his great dignity. Then we trace him through various incidents of his career, which are enacted in the great Cathedral that houses his shrine. He comes into conflict with the King, but will not budge even before a King. In a hasty moment Henry makes use of the historic phrase, "Who will rid me of this upstart priest?" or words to that effect. Four of his knights take him at his word, ride down to Canterbury, frighten the priests and monks, and at last attack Becket in his private chapel, where he is done to death, in a singularly effective scene which avoids the actual horror of murder. The conclusion of the film shows Henry in remorse before a vision of the murdered priest.

THE PENANCE OF BECKET (VITAGRAPH).

The Vitagraph actors and producers go from success to success. Some time ago we specially commended the masterly manner in which "Electra" was produced by this company. Again we find it our duty to hand out our very highest praise to all those concerned in this splendid Becket picture. To begin with: The acting is exceedingly fine. We were much impressed by the dignity of the Becket, and the willfulness of the haughty King. All the minor characters, knights, priests and monks, and the like, were acted with conviction and care. These were not mere stage supers; they were well trained, conscientious, careful actors. And then the scenery: architectural and otherwise—how astonishingly natural it all looked! We say this without reserve; we are familiar with the originals. Again, the dressing of the piece struck us as being accurate and with taste, whilst as to the photography of the picture, this was a veritable feast to eyes which, like our own, have been looking at photographs these many years, always like to look on a good one, but recoil at indifferent work. We take pleasure in mentioning it is to Mr. Kent, who impersonated Becket, that chiefest credit for this beautiful production is due. One "Becket," in our esteem, atones for a great deal of the ineptitudinous rubbish which unfortunately still finds a place on the moving picture screen. "Becket," in short, is a beautifully dignified, well acted, and carefully produced film masterpiece, which is bound very materially to enhance the growing reputation of the Vitagraph Company of America.

AROUND NEW YORK.

Now that the "open-air theater" season is upon us, I have visited several of these amusement gardens, for the purpose of noting the progress, if any, over last season's open-air shows, and with but a very few exceptions, was delighted with the class of entertainment offered. Not a few of these places have struck on the unique idea of catering to the comfort of their patrons in the novel way of offering for sale refreshments and cigars during the show. One place in particular that appealed to me most, is the new 181st Street Open-Air Theater, situated on the southwest corner of 181st street and Audubon avenue, in the very center of the residential section of the Bronx, and conducted by Spanuth & Smith. The theater has a seating capacity of 1,400, is well lighted, boasts of a refreshment booth and cigar stand, is equipped with a double dissolving standard American moving picture machine and Hallberg Economizer, which is called upon to project the pictures 120 feet. To avoid any possible attack of Jersey's famous product, the mosquito, the management have secured an abundant supply of Chinese incense, which is kept burning around the entire enclosure. It is these small courtesies that the public takes notice of and show their appreciation by favoring the managers and owners with their patronage. As each person enters, he or she is handed a program containing the names of the pictures and songs that are to constitute the evening's entertainment. This is strictly a moving picture theater, no vaudeville being shown. Service is supplied by the Dandy Film Exchange, 10 East Fifteenth street. The owners' report shows that the profits are far in excess of the expenses, which tends to verify our recent editorials, that vaudeville is not an absolute necessity towards the maintenance and support of a picture house. The 181st street house arranges its program in such a way as to make it easy for the public to study and criticise the releases of the different independent manufacturers by having an "Imp" night, in which none but "Imp" pictures are shown; a Powers' night, Thanhouser, Eclair, and so on down the line, showing ten pictures and giving two songs every night.

McARTHUR.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY LOSE ALL THEIR OLD REELS.

On the afternoon of Saturday, July 2, a fire broke out in the storerooms of the Vitagraph Company, and while it only lasted one hour, the premises were gutted with the exception of the executive offices across the hall. Only three employees were on the premises at the time and their prompt action prevented further damage. The Vitagraph Company occupied almost the entire first floor of the large office building at 116 Nassau street and did a large rental business. This was not interfered with; on the contrary, we are informed that they took on two new customers during the week. We learn that the fire was due to defective insulation in the wiring of the building. This started combustion in the woodwork of the wall, which in turn communicated to the shelves on which the reels were stored. While the non-inflammable reels were not consumed, they were damaged by water and the intense heat, over 1,000 reels being a total loss, as they carried no insurance. A peculiar condition of fire protection seems to be in force by the agent of the building: The fire hose of the building was secured by lock and chain so it could not be unrolled, and the iron shutters were not closed, although the tenants had almost all gone for the day.

CIVIC ASSOCIATION SEEKS TO REGULATE, INSTEAD OF CONDEMNING THE SHOWS.

The activity of the Cleveland Humane Society in regard to moving picture shows has been noticed in these columns before. Some would-be reformers insanely seek to eliminate the picture show entirely, not realizing that it is a more potent and more permanent factor for good than themselves. Contrast this with the policy of the Humane Society, constructive and not destructive, as outlined in the following circular letter sent to all theaters in their territory:

"The committee recognizes in the right kind of moving pictures," the letter says, "not only an important form of wholesome entertainment, but a great educational force as well. On the other hand it feels that pictures which illustrate methods of crime or present low or suggestive features, brutality or low ideals of morality or family life, have no place before audiences of which children form a large part.

"In general pictures depicting crime and vice and those depending upon immorality or suggestiveness are frowned upon. This does not imply the cutting out of every representation of a crime, for this might be incidental to an entirely proper and desirable story.

"Where thirty to fifty thousand people congregate every day, as they do in the moving picture shows of Cleveland, the community has a right to demand cleanliness and good ventilation.

"Attracting as these places do, six to ten thousand children daily, it is essential that the children be not led into a corrupting environment, and that they should not be subjected to the dangers of an unnecessarily darkened room.

"Nor should children be employed either as actors or as attendants in places as open to the public as these are."

Platteville, Wis.—The Grand Theater, formerly owned by Daly & Tiffany, was sold on July 1 to B. F. McKowen and W. N. Tiffany. It will be enlarged this Summer and made into one of the best moving picture houses in this section.

Tulso, Okla.—Messrs. Gregg and Olson have taken over the management of the Empire Theater, of this city. Mr. Gregg and Mr. Olson were formerly the managers of Lyric No. 2 and the Idle Hour Theater, respectively. Both men are wide awake exhibitors and are doing excellent business at their new theater, the Empire. It is an Independent house. This speaks well for the Independent film in the West.

New York, July 6, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—It has been rumored lately, among the film trade, that I had died, but I wish to impress upon everybody's mind that I am very much alive, and that I am the business manager for the Exhibitors' Film Exchange, 183 Third avenue, New York City, and that I am buying from 15 to 18 reels per week, which is considered very good for the Summer season, and expect to buy from 24 to 28 reels for the Fall.

I would ask you to kindly publish this letter in your paper, and let all my friends know that I am not a dead one.

Thanking you, I am, Yours truly,

CHAS. H. STREIMER.

OPERATORS' SCHOOLS.

By F. H. Richardson.

There has been a decided tendency on the part of operators to decry and traduce the school for operators. In the main, the stock objection has been that there were too many operators already and that the production of more would merely tend to reduce wages and lower the standard of the trade as a whole. This has been about the only objection the writer has heard advanced to date. At first glance it sounds reasonable, too, but, while the writer may be accused of bias, inasmuch as he lectures an hour each day at one of the schools, yet he ventures to say there is decided need for such an institution. Moreover, in the long run he does not think there will be any wage lowering through establishment of schools. On the other hand, if the instruction be bona fide and the school be rightly conducted, the benefits to be derived are many and excellent from every point of view. I venture to say that nine out of ten operators, take them as they come, would be most decidedly benefited by taking a course in the school. I do not mean he would be benefited simply because I am connected therewith, but I speak from the fact that I know what the man can learn at that particular school if he applies himself, whereas I am unacquainted with the work of any other. In fact that is what I would like to see, viz.: the operators themselves attending a school where they will obtain in concrete form the benefit of the experience of men who have been in the business for years, instead of attempting to blunder along and accomplish things by hit and miss. In the school the candidate for knowledge is taught the rudiments of electricity, the relation and measurement of lenses, how to plan and construct an operating room and fireproof and ventilate it, how to test for shorts, grounds, etc., how to make wire splices, how to recognize the various wiring systems and connect to them, what the various electrical terms really mean how to use and figure with them, how to properly splice and care for film, how to properly adjust his machine and hundreds of other things; and I want to say right here, that the knowledge thus acquired is worth to the man who intends to take up operating, or to the average operator, several times the fee that is charged. Moreover, if the man will apply himself and study he will be a far better operator than he would otherwise have probably ever been, by reason of his grounding in a school. "But," says one, "you can't learn to be an operator in a school any more than you can learn carpentry out of a book." Granted! Freely granted. But the boy who intends to become a carpenter will be a competent journeyman if he studies proper books and learns the theory well three years ahead of the one who attempts to learn it all by practical experience, and what is more, he will probably be a foreman or engaged on the finer work when the "all practical experience man" is still doing the rough work. The point is right here: The man who takes a course in a good operator's school and really applies himself to study, will, after one month's practical experience, be far ahead of the average operator who has been running three years! That is an absolute fact! As to having too many operators, we have not one-third enough! We have a surplus of half-way operators and a big surplus at that. But really good, competent, first class men are scarce as hen's teeth. Thousands of men who have really been operating two, three and four years actually don't know how to figure the focal length of their lenses, cannot tell you what is the difference between "equivalent" and "back" focus and do not understand how to figure exactly the focal length of lens to give a certain size picture at a given throw. Figure exactly, mind. Those who know anything at all about it will usually tell you to "divide the throw by the size of picture required." This is not correct even for projection lens, especially for long throws, and is nowhere right for the stereo lens. Yet these same men will scout the idea of a school having any value! Well, they have several more "scouts" coming! My prediction is that the schools will do good operators no harm, but that they will gradually put a lot of would-bes out of business, and as they ought to be put out there will be no harm done.

I think the school will have no tendency to reduce wages in any degree, but it will have a tendency to compel some of the men who have been operating to get busy and acquire some real knowledge of their business or else step out and make room for those who have done so. And I am heartily in favor of that very proposition. Please bear in mind the fact, for it is a fact, that I am not defending the school merely because I happen at this time to be employed an hour a day lecturing at one of them. I have simply spoken what I believe to be true concerning the whole proposition. And there you are!

WHAT THE DAISY SAID

A Time-honored Superstition Verified

This is a pretty Biograph pastoral in which two sisters, after consulting the daisy as to whether their sweethearts loved them, meet at different times a handsome young gypsy who in telling their fortunes, plans their futures to suit himself. He induces the love of both, each unknown to the other, only to be discovered in his perfidy. After having their hearts wounded by the unconscionable Nomad, they decide to follow the daisy's prophecy and return to their former sweethearts.

A CHILD'S FAITH

How the Little One's Prayer Was Answered

In this Biograph subject is shown the efficacy of prayer. A young woman weds against her father's will and is disowned. Later the husband dies leaving her to care for their little ten year old child. In the meantime, the old father has become a veritable miser, and to reduce his expenses moves into cheaper quarters which happens to be, quite unknown to either, just above those of his disowned daughter. Not trusting the banks, he hides his wealth in the chimney. The poor mother and child are on the verge of starvation when the child kneels and prays for help. At this moment the old man is returning his money after counting it to his chimney bank, when it falls through to the fireplace below. The child, of course, imagines it comes from Heaven in answer to her prayer. In regaining his wealth the old man is so touched by the child's faith that a reunion is effected.

A CHILD'S FAITH. Who is there who really disbelieves in the efficacy of prayer? The most hardened and indifferent worldly man will in time of desperation or danger almost involuntarily breathe a prayer to the Almighty for help or protection. Many are the occasions where calamities have been averted by a sincere prayer, and in this Biograph subject is shown the efficaciousness of a little child's appeal for help for her mother. At the opening of the story we find Alice Paulton incurring the extreme displeasure of her father by rejecting the suit of the favored young man of her father for one of her own choice. Determined to marry this man she is disowned by her father, and so leaves his roof and is married. Mr. Paulton, being a widower, at first grieves over the loss of his daughter's love, but later becomes a monomaniac, money being his only thought, and to hoard this his only aim. He becomes a veritable tyrant, grinding his debtors most unreasonably. Thus things go on for several years. Meanwhile a girl child has blessed the young couple, and at the end of ten years the young father is in the last stage of consumption, with little strength left to work. Dire poverty reigns in the household, and in desperation the wife goes to her father to implore his aid. He is now in the extreme of money-madness, and almost throws her from his house. The worst is to come, and it comes soon the young father dies. Here the poor woman is left destitute, with her little girl to care for. Her attempts to secure employment are in vain and starvation stares them in the face. But the little child has faith in prayer. The old man's temper has now gotten worse and his niggardliness more excessive, until finally he sells his home that he may add the returns to his hoard and moves into cheaper quarters. Fate leads him to engage the squalid room directly above his own daughter and granddaughter, although he is quite unaware of it. He is at a loss to find a place to hide his money until he espies a stove-pipe hole in the chimney wall. This he reckons a safe bank, so here he keeps it. On the floor below we see the poor woman despairing, until when she leaves for the next room, the child kneels and prays for aid. At the same moment the old man is replacing his gold in his chimney bank, and shoving it in too far, down the chimney it falls, striking the fireplace below and rolling out in front of the kneeling child. She at onces believes it came from the Heavenly Father, and so kneels in thanksgiving. The old man becomes a raging demon at the loss of his money, and when the janitor directs him to the apartment beneath he bursts in and snatches the money from the child's hands. The confusion brings in the mother, and a recognition occurs. The old man is adamant, however, and still refuses aid to his daughter. While in the hall on his way to his own apartment, the thought of the little child on her knees praying with such faith impresses him, and changes his entire nature. Well, he returns to his daughter and granddaughter for good.

WHAT THE DAISY SAID.—"He loves, he loves me not, he loves me!" What faith have we not placed in this floral prophet when we were in the spring of life. Infallible was its answer when we pulled off each petal repeating the above litany. At the opening of this Biograph subject, we find Martha and Milly, two sisters, in the daisy field asking of that little mystic flower the momentous question, "Does he love me?" The answer in both cases is "Yes" and off the happy little maids skip towards the homestead. Martha learns of the presence in the village of a band of gypsies and is anxious to have her fortune told by one of these Nomads, curious to know if the story of the daisy is true. Foolish girl not to believe implicitly in the daisy. For this scepticism or, rather, lover's apostasy, she incurs the displeasure of the daisy and vengeance is certain. A handsome young gypsy appears, reads her palm, planning her future to suit himself. Martha is fascinated by the young Nomad and later really loves and believes in him, meeting him clandestinely at the foot of a waterfall as often as possible. Finally she persuades her sister Milly to have her fortune told by the gypsy, of course, not hinting of her love for the young man. However, the gypsy now makes the sisters unknown rivals of each other for him, each girl guarding her secret carefully. But the daisy wreaks its vengeance when Martha comes suddenly upon her sister and the gypsy at the waterfall. She witnesses the wretch's perfidy unseen by them, and so she stealthily departs vowing never to see him again. At this time the old father of the two girls remarking their absence goes in search of them. He is amazed upon surprising his daughter Milly in the company of the gypsy, and an argument ensues which results in the old man being knocked down. The girl's cries bring several farmhands, who, thinking the old man killed, start after the gypsy to annihilate him. He is in a fair way of being apprehended when he arrives at the gate of the homestead where Martha is seated weeping from chagrin and disappointment. He appeals to her to save him, which she at first is loathe to do, but [illegible] to defeats him into a barred and covered [illegible] so that which he pursues arrive [illegible] safely under cover. Meanwhile the vast [illegible] bound to have been only stunned by his fall [illegible] a go way suit, so the hands are asked to depart [illegible] date design. Still they [illegible] to stop where the young scoundrel has now arrived and order him to leave the neighborhood at once, following him for a distance to be sure he obeys their injunction. The girls are now regenerated in their faith in the daisy, each going to her sincere rustic sweetheart.

A WIRELESS ROMANCE.—Miss Warren, a young girl of fashionable society, is still quite undecided if she shall entrust her heart and hand into the keeping of a well known clubman, a gentleman of fashion, when a slight accident occurs, simple in the extreme, yet destined to change the course of at least three lives. This mishap is the dropping of a fan over a cliff near a river bank. In itself it is nothing, but it results in Miss Warren's acquaintance with a stranger who proves to be a wireless operator.

Their second meeting occurs on a street corner while he is on his way to his station, a short distance off. Naught will do but the fashionable Miss Warren must visit for the first time and inspect the marvels and wonders of this modern invention. Soon she is deeply absorbed in the mysteries of wireless, while her teacher is more deeply absorbed in the color of her eyes, her hair and the dainty smile that lurks around her lips. At any rate the lesson continues, only it is a different kind of wireless from the Marconi system that is being flashed from eye to eye during long walks along the beach and silent good byes at the gate of Miss Warren's mansion. One has but little doubt about the messages being all wireless, and I think it was stupid little Cupid who invented this system ages and ages ago.

In the maze of mystery and mirth that has followed this fascinating flirtation and its quick ripening into deep human love, Miss Warren has almost forgotten to inform her fashionable suitor that his case is hopeless. Suddenly she is brought to her senses by a scandalous newspaper article in which her name is mentioned as being associated with a wager made in a drinking brawl at a public cafe, the wager being that her hand will be won within a week. In a moment Miss Warren sees her wireless operator as a common, drunken boaster, who has dared to boast that she has surrendered her heart to him.

Hot with wounded pride and humiliation she writes Mr. Hartley, her almost forgotten suitor, that she accepts his offer of marriage and that they must be married at once. She will meet him aboard his private yacht and run down to Marrow, where they will be married before nightfall. Within a few hours she finds herself far out at sea, and is just beginning to realize what she is doing when she detects Mr. Hartley in the act of sending a wireless message claiming he has "won his wager." Then the truth dawns upon her—she had made the mistake of accusing the wrong man? She demands that Hartley return with her, but no! the game has gone too far now for this man of fashion to turn back and be made the laughing stock of all his friends. She will have to carry out her own proposition and marry him that night at Marrow.

In the little wireless station at the sea coast sits the operator smoking his pipe and dreaming of one sweet girl who dropped her fan, when suddenly he hears the signal of distress. Again it comes flashing through the air followed by the initials of Ruth Warren,—"on board Hartley's private yacht." A half hour later and a small racing launch slips out from the wharf bound for Marrow with a certain wireless operator on board. A chase at sea is a new feature in the moving picture field and one that adds an exciting interest to this especially fine film of the Edison Company.

"Homeward bound" is the last sub-title, and it easily tells the closing incident in a fine photographic film which is filled with exceedingly dramatic situations, and which will hold popular sway wherever it is shown.

OUT OF THE NIGHT.—Robert Austin, a man of sterling qualities, self-made and self-reliant, meets and falls in love with Marmion Moore, a charming young New York society woman. The love story progresses to the point where Austin has almost declared himself when the current of events is turned. Austin and Miss Moore are riding in the park one day when her horse takes fright and bolts. Austin, in attempting to save Miss Moore, catches the bridle rein of the runaway, but his own horse swerves and he is dragged and trampled, without, however, releasing his hold. Miss Moore, although thrown, is practically unhurt, but Austin is so severely injured that his life is despaired of. He recovers his health, however, but it is soon manifest that his eyesight is going. This fact becomes painfully evident to him, and the opinion of the eminent specialist whom he consults, far from giving him encouragement, only convinces him that it will be a matter of only a very short time when the light of day with him will give place to the darkness of night.

HOW BUMPTIOUS PAPERED THE PARLOR.—Bumptious objects to the price asked for repapering the pretty little parlor in his home, and decides that the operation is so simple that any child ought to be able to perform it and that consequently it will be an easy trick for him.

The picture shows his reaching this decision, his selecting the wall paper at the store and then the beginning of the difficulties. Rolls of wall paper are hard things to carry, and when he finally does get them home he finds that the making of the paste is an operation which causes some trouble in addition to its practical difficulties. He tries to soothe the injured feelings of the cook with a kiss and thereby creates another set of injured feelings in his wife, who happens to enter at the psychological moment.

And then the real fun begins, for Bumptious' management of the paste brush and paste proves disastrous to the parlor furniture, the curtains and floors, as well as to the wall he is trying to decorate. He does get one piece of paper up, but it is pretty crooked, which fact promptly starts an argument. He appeals to one of his friends, who is brought in by the wife to see the operation, and by making the appeal loses his balance from the top of the ladder, with the result that the wife and the friend and Bumptious himself are deluged with paste when he falls, and the whole room is made to look as if a cyclone had struck it. The last scene of this uproarious story shows the "easiest way," and with some very effective trick work brings a final laugh to close the picture with.

AN ADVERTISEMENT ANSWERED.—Young Robert Earl, a prosperous farmer, is a bachelor, good looking, but, who, up to this time has overlooked the subject of matrimony. In the beginning of the picture we have a view of the laborers and hands returning from the field when they are met by their wives and children. Young Earl watches them go down the road, all happy and contented, and he sighs for just these sort of companions to fill the void in his life.

He is further induced to try a hand at matrimony when he has finished with his supper, cooked by himself, and the washing of the dishes, done by himself. Therefore, straightway after he has finished his household work he writes a note to a city paper requesting them to print a personal in the matrimonial want ad column, requesting a wife.

A day or two later he receives a dozen or more letters from certain ladies all anxious to be his wife.

The number of letters confuses him and as a final mode of solving the problem, he writes a letter to each, seals and addresses them and then, shuffling them up, closes his eyes and selects one at random.

Satisfied with this he goes out and sends one of the hands in for the letter which he wishes mailed. The hand becomes confused and takes the bunch of letters, unconscious that he is implicating his employer in a rather disagreeable predicament.

The next day young Earl goes to the train to meet the elected bride. She arrives—a dozen of her. Earl sees that something is wrong and beats a hasty retreat with the bunch of women at his heels.

The pursued and pursuers do a Marathon through meadows, orchards, woods, until the young farmer is exhausted. He finally reaches home and runs in, but the foremost and most athletic of the ladies follows him into the kitchen, pleading with him to have her. He looks at her face, then jumps out of the window. She follows and the rest of the mob, having caught up, join in the pursuit. Out through the orchard they go when young Earl espies an apple tree which seems to offer refuge. He quickly climbs into the branches but Miss Athlete is not feazed by this and goes on up after him as actively as a polar bear.

The hunted farmer drops to the ground and is seized by the ladies, each demanding that he marry her, according to the invitation she has received.

Now it happens there is a little lady, who had always brought up in the rear of the chase and who was even now lingering in the background, and it is she with her dreamy eyes under the lace bonnet who Robert deigns to smile upon.

"You are the one," he says, freeing himself from the rest. And the little girl is led off timidly while Earl's other farmhands hold back the infuriated feminine husband seekers.

Two years later we have a pretty scene at Robert's home. Things have changed. Mrs. Earl and the baby have filled that empty void in his heart and he is a happy and contented man.

TRAILED TO THE WEST.—Harry Forsyth, a young Easterner, happy in the belief that his wife loves him above all others, bids her good-bye one day to leave for a neighboring city. The next few scenes show him at his room in the hotel in a distant town, eagerly awaiting some message from home. Two days go by and the letter is not forthcoming. Worried about what may have occurred at home, young Forsyth, over a long distance telephone, is put into communication with his butler at home. The butler reads him the following message, with the statement that his wife left the house a few days before in company of another man:

"Dear Harry—I am going away with another man I love better than you. Forget me and be happy. Yours, GLADYS."

After young Forsyth recovers from this terrible shock he decides to hunt out the man who wrecked his home and have revenge. After many weary days of search he finds his wife in a dismal attic room, half starved and dying from a broken heart. The man she had loved and for whom she had sacrificed everything had grown tired of her and gone away.

Forsyth, learning that Phillips, the villain, has gone West, kisses his wife good-bye and makes a solemn vow to run down the traitor.

His wanderings take him West. Occasionally he loses the trail but finds it and continues his search with but one ambition in life and that—revenge. Into mining camps, cattle ranches, through the timber lands he traces Phillips, the quarry seeming to just slip through his fingers at the moment when he has him.

However, the pursuit ends one night in a gambling dive in one of the mining camps. Forsyth enters, scans each face and seats himself at a table. The man opposite looks at him covertly, unsuspicious, as Forsyth brings forth a locket which contains Phillips' picture. He compares the face with the one in the locket, then rising pulls his revolver. There is a flash and Phillips tumbles over on the floor, while Forsyth, covering the others with his gun, leaps over the tables and chairs and runs out of the place.

An exciting chase follows, after the sheriff has been acquainted with the murder and a posse has been organized, but the fugitive eludes them.

The scene shifts to the interior of a miner's shack two or three days later. The miner enters, studying a poster which advertises a reward for the arrest of Forsyth, or Andy Reel, as he is known in the West. He is preparing his frugal meal when there is a knock at the door and he opens it to the fugitive murderer. There is no mistaking the identity as the poster prints a picture of the fugitive.

The miner gives the starving murderer food but as he is about to leave the miner whips out his gun and threatens to shoot if his captive moves a muscle. Forsyth drops into a chair in despair. Then he brings out a note which he has carried with him for many years and shows it to the miner. This affects the latter strangely and when the sheriff and posse ride up a few moments later the miner denies having seen anything of the fugitive and they go on out of sight.

Forsyth is grateful and asks the miner's reason for his sudden change of mind. The miner brings out a note which, he, too, has kept for many years. It reads

"Dear Tom—I am going away with a man I love better than you. Forgive and forget me and be happy. Yours, MARY."

Then he stretches out his hand and the two men look into each other's eyes. "I got my man," says the miner. "Did you?" Forsyth nods his head.

A HIDDEN SERPENT.—A Hindoo servant is fascinated by the wife of his master. By a forged letter he gets the husband out of the house, and then declares his love, but is repulsed. Thirsting for revenge he places a snake in the revolver case of his master who, upon returning, opens this to take out his revolver, and is fatally bitten by the snake. The success of the Hindoo's ruse, however, is short, for he is shot by the heartbroken wife.

IN THE REALM OF THE CZAR.—This is a film of good quality, showing views inside the City of Moscow. Views of every place of interest are seen, the market places especially noteworthy. The fine quality is preserved throughout.

We see first the Theater place. Then the Traitskia gate. Next the Iberian gate and chapel which the Czar always visits when going to the Kremlin.

Now the Red Place and Saviour Gate.

The St. Basile cathedral, built by Ivan the Terrible in 1555 in remembrance of the capture of Kazan. The Russian Czars are crowned in this cathedral.

The church of the Saviour on the banks of the Moswa.

The Kremlin—a view from Sophie Hill. The Kremlin is the most famous monument in Moscow.

Then, we see different markets. Among others, the bird market on the Troubnaia place.

THE JOLLY WHIRL.—Several young men are enjoying an especially happy hour at lunch in a cafe when one announces that he is possessed of mediumistic powers.

His companions challenge him to display his ability in affecting inanimate objects. This serves to introduce a series of remarkable exhibits in which he thoroughly mixes chair, tables, carts and people. The situations follow one another very rapidly and keep the onlooker in a first class state of suspense.

JUPITER SMITTEN.—Our hero, Amphitryon, has been for some time absent from his home while engaged in battle with a hostile nation.

Alqmene, his wife, longs for the return of her husband. He, attacked with the same complaint, prepares himself to visit his wife. Jupiter looking from his throne notes these plans and things being slow in his realm, he resolves to have a little game of his own, so disguised as Amphitryon, he journeys away to visit Alqmene, reaching her before her husband does. He is effusively greeted, but things become a trifle confused when the real Amphitryon appears. Swords are drawn and blows are exchanged when Jupiter changes himself to the the original image of Jupiter. Amphitryon and Alqmene fall on their knees, are forgiven, and Jupiter departs.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

THE WICKED BARON AND THE PAGE.—Boy and old mother gathering firewood, are beaten by the Lord of the Manor, but on being found by a neighboring squire's daughter are carried to her home. The boy is engaged as her page. The Lord pays court to the lady, but is repulsed. Engages bandits, who waylay and capture her and her maid. The page, escaping, runs for help. Her father comes to the rescue and is disarmed by the Lord, when the little page steps in and keeps the Lord at bay until the ladies have escaped. The page is rewarded for his bravery, vowing allegiance to his benefactress.

THE MOONLIGHT FLITTING.—Two young fellows being compelled to make a hasty exit from their lodgings let down their furniture through the window. A policeman interferes, but they, with great resource, hook the officer of the law by the belt, and haul him midway between the ground and the window, where he cannot interfere. The poor man looks very comical in a state of suspense. When the rogues have gone the policeman is rescued and succeeds in getting possession of their property. In the end the young men get it back again, and set up house elsewhere.

GRANDMOTHER. The story centers around the escapades of the pampered son of a wealthy father who falls in love with a popular dancer years older than himself and who is only slightly amused at the young man's ardor. Of course there are other admirers and when the young man finds that the way to the dancer's heart seems to lie through the giving of expensive presents, he bethinks himself of his mother's jewels. His idea is that she has so many beautiful treasures that she would hardly miss a rope of pearls, and with easy conscience he opens the family safe, takes the pearls and presents them to the lady fair. Of course the loss is discovered and a detective is summoned to solve the mystery. In the meantime the boy's grandmother, a most lovable old lady (played in person by Mrs. Heely, one of the most famous old ladies of the stage) notices the boy's great distress of mind and persuades him to confess to her, and knowing the truth the old lady goes to the dancer and tells her the whole story of the boy's impending disgrace. Her touching appeal softens the heart of the adventuress and she restores the jewels to the old lady, who brings them home just in time to prevent the boy's everlasting disgrace.

CORPORAL TRUMAN'S WAR STORY.—The story opens as Corporal Truman leaves home to join the G. A. R. parade, shows his reunion with his old comrades and the parade itself and the decorating of the graves and all the real happenings in a noted New England village.

Following the memorial day exercises the veterans have a dinner and at this dinner Corporal Truman is asked to tell the story of his empty sleeve. The story is told in pictures and is one of the liveliest war incidents ever portrayed on a moving picture screen. It affords such a sharp contrast to the scenes which have gone before that when the picture again reverts to the banquet table and we see the veterans rising to cheer Corporal Truman and to join in his toast for the stars and stripes, we all feel like joining in the outburst of applause.

THE HIGHBINDERS.—A story of Chinatown that has seldom been excelled for gripping interest. Sung Loo and his cousin, Sung Pho, are star pupils at the Chinese Mission, their close attendance serving as a moral aid to their characters. Sung Loo is janitor of the Mission and the favorite of all the teachers, but when away from the Mission he is a hatchet man for one of the powerful tongs, working in conjunction with Sung Pho. Pretty Bessie Radcliffe is his particular teacher and she is very proud of her apt pupil. When the Reverend John Grismer comes to Chinatown and recognized the teacher as a schoolmate, she introduces Sung Loo as her most able pupil. Sung does not fancy the intrusion of the good looking minister for he has hopes of winning Bessie for his own wife, and this dislike is brought to a focus when the minister discovers the Sungs to be hatchet men, and prevents the murder of a Chinese merchant who has refused to pay blackmail to the Tong. The two Sungs linger in the Mission room after class is dismissed and decide that the minister must be got out of the way. Bessie has come back to obtain a forgotten book and hearing Grismer's name slips behind the window curtains. The hatchet men depart on their bloody mission, but Bessie gets to the telephone in time to warn

Rosemary—For Remembrance

Released, Monday, July 18th

Here's a film we are bragging about with good cause, for every point that goes to make for perfection is unusually good. Not only is the story one of those that grips the heart, but the acting is exceptional and the placement of scenes most picturesque. Pretty strong talk, but wait until you have seen the film. Insist on having it soon. Don't wait.

THE ALMIGHTY DOLLAR.—On the same reel with "The Highlanders," "The Almighty Dollar" supplies a sprightly comedy relief. It is one of those little Lubin farces that mean a lot to the man who makes up a balanced program and finds small supply of comedy. Some wag soldier's a trick to a silver dollar and drives it into the seat of a chair in a saloon. A man must be more than human who would let an ownerless dollar get past him and everyone who enters makes an effort to get the dollar unperceived, then joins the crowd to wait for the next victim. But a peddler who is "stung" along with the rest proves himself quick witted, for he makes away with the coin, even though he has to take the chair with it. The rest of the victims give chase and for a time it looks as though the peddler would not get away with his plunder, but he slips into a barber shop, where the removal of his beard effects a permanent disguise. He looks like a new man, and perhaps that is the reason why he walks off with another man's coat and hat, well pleased with the result of his capture of the dollar. It's a short subject, but there is about a thousand feet of fun crowded into the story.

THE ADOPTED DAUGHTER.—Laura Townsend is the adopted daughter of an evil couple who keep a roadhouse in the Southwest. The girl is treated more like a slave than an adopted daughter and, worse yet, her parents favor the suit of a Mexican, who is the sometime partner of their crimes. The girl detests him and when he seeks to urge his suit as she is on her way to town she struggles desperately to avoid his caresses, but is saved only by the arrival on the scene of Gordon Harvey, a young ranchman, who puts the Mexican to flight. Harvey is on his way to town and he takes Laura with him and brings her again to the inn. On their return they are overlooked by the Mexican who disables the wagon and forces Harvey to stop at the road house for repairs. It is plotted that he shall be murdered and robbed, but Laura overhears the conversation and warns her benefactor, urging him to flee. Harvey is not disposed to run away, but when he finds that his revolver has been put out of commission he determines to escape and carry the girl with him. They are pursued and caught, but in the altercation that follows the foster father and his accomplice fall over the cliff, while Harvey takes the girl to his ranch, where she is welcomed by his mother, and it is evident that her troubles are over.

PATHE FRERES.

JUST FOR GOOD LUCK.—A hunchback for luck is a curious superstition which has been utilized for the foundation of the plot of this film. The hunchback in the present instance marries a young lady who is afflicted with a fatal propensity to drop every article of crockery she happens to touch. After her marriage she becomes skillful and adroit as could be wished for, and she daily congratulates herself upon the wisdom of her mother, who directed her choice of a suitable husband.

Science accomplishes all things, however, and the hunchback, reading one day of a doctor's back straightener, seeks a consultation with the physician and is persuaded to be operated upon. After being immured in a formidable looking machine, in appearance something like a small gasometer, he is subjected to the treatment, which consists of the upper half of the contrivance being raised by means of a lever. The hunchback emerges fairly straight, and the operation is completed by the application of an enormous iron.

At the same moment, the wife commences again to smash all the crockery in the house, and the return of her husband as straight as a dart explains the cause. Hurt and angry, she and her mother drag him back to the physician for the purpose of having his hump restored, but here he strenuously revolts and declares that if a hunchback is necessary in the family, his mother-in-law must be sacrificed, which she accordingly is with satisfactory results.

THE FAITHLESS LOVER.—It is a Spring night in the picturesque old town of Grenada, and a handsome lad is seen serenading his ladylove, under whose window he stands singing to the accompaniment of his guitar. The beautiful senorita knowing the musician to be none other than the youth to whom she has long since given her heart, soon steps out on the veranda and joins him. Her father, however, calls her in to help him with his work. The thought of the love that her childhood friend bears toward her has been the one bright spot in the motherless girl's uneventful life, and consequently bitter indeed is her awakening a few days later when she finds that the one she thought so true has been unfaithful and now prefers another in her place. Avoided and spurned by him she implores her father to avenge her. He takes his gun and, finding the gay youth making love to his new conquest, himself becomes enraged and follows the fickle boy through the beautiful country until at last coming up to him he is enabled to avenge his daughter.

THE OVERLAND COACH ROBBERY.—The driver of the mail coach running between Ajaccio and Bastia is handed orders to stop at the Treasury office and receive a large amount of gold to be conveyed by the coach to the bank at Bastia. These orders are stolen from him by two of a band of bandits, whose crimes and depredations have terrorized the country. We see the coach start out with its human freight and the large of gold, and take for hand road that winds through a wild part of the country. At one point where the road takes a bend the bandits spring out from an ambush, and wounding the frightful driver, secure the gold, smashes the doors and lead them off, together with the passengers as captives. The driver, left lying on the ground after a while recovers sufficiently to be able to stagger along the road until he meets two policemen. He tells them his story and aid is summoned. With the aid of a big dog they scour the country, and the hiding place of the brigands is soon discovered.

A POLITICAL DISCUSSION.—Two friends are engaged in a fiery discussion on politics at the dinner table, and this discussion, as so often happens, ends in blows which become more vigorous, until one of them in the heat of the moment is killed. Haunted by gruesome visions of an untimely end, the survivor stuffs the body into a trunk and makes tracks for the frontier. Stopped, however, by the customs officials, he thinks it better to retrace his steps, but this decision arouses the officers, who set out in pursuit, accompanied by two of the police. The criminal to avoid being captured, leaves the trunk in the field, just hiding the body in a haystack. His victim, however, is not dead, and presently emerging is taken into custody by the officers of the law. Meanwhile the friend, repentant and remorseful, resolves to give himself up, and is thrown into the cell already occupied by the man he believes to be dead. Mutual recognition and reconciliation follow and politics are forgotten in the joy of the reunion.

PLEASE TAKE ONE.—Bonehead is not a success in distributing handbills to the passersby, according to his arrangement with the exacting owner of the market, and is therefore fired, and his late employer fastens the packet of throw-aways on a slate in the center of which he chalks the words "Please take one." The slate is then put outside the door. Seeing this, Bonehead seizes the slate, and tearing away the handbills, plants it in the middle of the fruit, vegetables and fine poultry displayed for sale outside the store. At the sight of the invitation two policemen quickly take advantage of it. Thrifty housewives need no second bidding to fill their baskets, and Bonehead himself collects all the idlers of the neighborhood to do honor to the notice. The storekeeper is soon alive to the situation, and, beside himself with rage, he shouts for the police. The two members of the force, who have already passed, return and, under the impression that order is required to be restored, distribute the provisions themselves. Naturally the storekeeper complains still more forcibly, and the two policemen, disgusted to see their efforts so little appreciated, retaliate by taking him into custody.

A GOOD LOSER.—The widow Hillman and her charming daughter, Maisie, have just entertained to lunch in their home their friend, Paul Phillips, a young man who ardently admires Maisie. His affection is not, however, returned by the young lady. While he is helping Maisie to wash up the dishes, Franklin Steele, a rich, handsome young fellow, also an admirer of Maisie, calls and joins them. Meantime an old miserly lawyer who has a mortgage on the house calls upon Mrs. Hillman and informs her that unless she pays off the mortgage she must vacate the old home. Franklin coming into the room with some of the clean dishes, overhears the conversation and secretly tells the lawyer to await him outside. Shortly after Franklin makes his excuses and leaves. He meets the lawyer and arranges to settle for the mortgage on condition that the Hillmans must on no account suspect that they are indebted to anyone but the lawyer. The next day we see Franklin ride up just as Maisie is going to the well for some water. Leaving his horse in her care, he relieves her of this duty, and Paul coming up in his absence proposes and is refused by Maisie. Angry and irritated that she will not have him and suspecting that Franklin is his rival he endeavors to vent his ire on the poor unfortunate horse, but Maisie snatches the whip from him and bids him to leave. Running in to tell her mother she finds the lawyer there and he takes out an envelope and draws from it the mortgage, and to their utter astonishment destroys it. While her mother is thanking him for his unaccountable generosity, Maisie picks up the envelope and finds in it a letter from Franklin to the lawyer, and then sees through the whole affair. Franklin enters the house in time to see this denouement, and unable to conceal the real facts, bids the lawyer depart and is accepted by Maisie as her future husband. About to depart, Paul is still found hanging round the horse, and on learning the state of matters proves himself a good loser and congratulates heartily the young couple.

ALGERIAN STUD.—This picture gives a very good idea of the breeding stud maintained in Algeria by the French Government. We are enabled to see at close view the beautiful thoroughbreds and their graceful foals and fillies at close quarters. The coloring adds greatly to the effect and the film is a very interesting one.

THE GREATEST OF THESE IS CHARITY. The Little Dot and her old grandfather in spite of their poverty lead a happy life, until one day as he is out with the organ the poor old man is picked down by a motor and taken to the hospital. The unfeeling landlord pushes the Little Dot out for the rent and she is forced to go out with the organ. One day a charitable lady catches sight of the little girl and learning the sad story, takes care of the child until the old grandfather is convalescent, she then goes to their room, with food for Dot, a bribe, as she wishes to get the little girl, but when Dot hears that she is to leave her grandfather she does not want the food and rushes into her grandfather's arms; but the dear old lady is not to be daunted, if she must have Dot without her grandfather, well he will come as well, and we see grandpa and Little Dot installed in their new home, where she is right by the old man to be very grateful to her benefactress. A well acted and pretty story.

BILL'S SERENADE. Starting off on mischief Bill espies Polly, the handsome young laundry girl, and rushes after her. She is, however, too quick for him and disappears indoors. Bill is after her, but is soon pitched out and lands in the midst of a sack of feathers. Polly is seen laughing at him from the window. Poor Bill goes back to the barracks crestfallen and throwing himself on the bed, dreams. Awaking with a start he takes his mandolin and sets out to serenade the lady love in which his antics are most comical. He succeeds in attracting the young lady's attention who invites him to climb to her window. Bill loses no time and is soon hanging to the balcony and is just taking a well earned kiss when he is pulled down, with the aid of a broom, by the mother. Bill's ardor becomes dampened, for he lands in a butt of water where he is found by his superior officer. A screaming comedy.

ECLAIR.

THE NURSE'S TRUNK. Louis and Peter, two young scamps, succeed in disguising as young women so well that they are employed by a private family as nurse and housemaid. Funny and merry are the tricks they perform under cover of their disguise, but one day are taken by surprise while up to some of their pranks, they become frightened and dash away to their room. When they arrive on the top floor they both jump into the nurse's trunk, which is big and without stopping to consider the consequences, they hurl themselves, trunk and all, out the window. A couple of policemen happen to be passing at that moment and catch the trunk as it falls. They immediately proceed to the station house to hand over their "find." Upon opening the trunk the two rascals are found huddled together, and almost as flat as a pancake. The officials of the station house immediately conceive the idea that the two policemen have played a trick on them and proceed to beat the rescuers mercilessly. Meanwhile the two causes of all the trouble have come to themselves, and great is their mirth at the discomfiture of the police—through the trick they have played.

TO-MORROW IS PAY DAY. Mr. Penniless will not receive his wages until to-morrow, notwithstanding the fact that he has not eaten anything all day and has grown excruciatingly hungry. He makes every effort and employs every conceivable stratagem to obtain a meal, but all without avail. Night comes on, and Mr. Penniless falls asleep, only to be overcome by a terrible nightmare. He sees food in all its forms—the substantial and the fancy pass tauntingly before his eyes, but he is unable to grasp any of it, or to convey a single morsel to his longing lips. At last he jumps up, lights a match and glances at his watch—one minute past twelve! Ye gods! The nightmare has passed in an instant—who cares for to-morrow, for it is pay day!

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CO.

RED FERN AND THE KID.—The Kid enters the room in time to prevent Andy from forcing a kiss upon Red Fern. She entered to dispose of a bread work, when Andy thought it would be a huge joke to compel her to drink the undesired liquor. The Kid saves her from this and thereby wins her gratitude, and, it would seem, her love. Andy, provoked at his interference, wants to strike him, but the Kid is undaunted by the approach of the cowboys, and they, admiring his bravery, rescue Andy. When Red Fern and the Kid meet later they tell of their love and the latter of his plan to make her his squaw. So they go to the tavern and the Kid offers his horse and saddle in payment for Red Fern. But this is not enough. A thief would have two horses. Unable to pay the price, the Kid bids good-bye to Red Fern and gives her his handkerchief. Love, and the desire to become the Kid's squaw, being uppermost in her mind, she steals money from the tavern, and when about to be detected by the proprietor, she wounds him and makes off, dropping, however, the Kid's handkerchief. She runs to him and gives him the money wherewith to purchase her. He asks how she obtained it and hesitatingly she tells him. He tears it away and at that minute the sheriff comes to arrest the Kid, having identified the handkerchief. Red Fern holds them off and the Kid makes his escape. At the end of a long chase they catch him and are about to hang him. Red Fern arrives, however, in time to save the needed explanation, after which they are presented with the ranch and all move happy.

A MEXICAN LOVE AFFAIR. Jealousy! Jealousy! The most terrible when contemptuous feminine charms are the primary division. Marta and Manuel are engaged sweethearts, with Marietta and Jose. Love and jealousy are brothers. It is not a long time that Manuel sees Marietta to dance with him, whereupon she does. Marta accepts Jose's proposition "just for fun," but she is horribly jealous, and her feeling is fanned tenfold when she catches Manuel flirting with Marietta. Marta suggests a walk to Marietta and they leave for Mexcaus to their own devices. When the girls get near the cove Marta's jealousy escapes its bounds and she scolds Marietta, who loses her balance and goes tumbling into the water. Marta watches her struggling and is overcome with grief at her quintessential act. She hastens to find Jose and Manuel and finally locates them dancing with other girls. When she relates the event they all rush to Marietta's aid. She is about exhausted when they get back. Jose loses no time in plunging to her rescue, while the others excitedly watch them from the shore. Jose swims through the breakers with Marietta and carries her back to the fete, while Manuel supports Marta, who is suffering from the effect of her jealous rage. Marietta reproves Jose, gives Marta, each take and keep their own sweethearts, and the fete resumes in joyous tumult.

YANKEE

THE RIGHT TO LABOR.—"The mills have been shut down for six months." No need to go into extensive details; can you not see the gaunt faces, the wild and hollow eye, the pinch of poverty obscuring the heavens from these poor suffering souls? A policeman has said: "Some men go through life with their eyes half closed, like a tailor threading a needle." So did John Caxton, the owner of the mills. From continued self indulgence, luxury, comfort, a disposition to sidestep every issue that might disturb the serenity of his life, he became an inert mass, simply a receptacle for money made by those who toiled for him at starvation wages. McBride, his manager, was a good man to have about. What would Caxton do without this paragon of a man, who relieved him of the annoyance of thinking too much? Well, McBride, a product of the lower East Side, was for Mac first, foremost and last, never losing a trick, and you can bet it an opportunity to be cruel, mean and treacherous and generally dirty presented itself, Mac never passed it by. The workmen hated his "insides" and not without cause. Caxton was half disposed to meet their demands, but Mac insisted that their percentage of profit was lower than the preceding year. The men began to get turbulent. Such conditions bring out agitation and Schmidt, who was secretly an anarchist, lost no time in stirring them up to a frenzy; but there are generally some good heads who believe in pacific measures, and such a one was John Strong, a first-class mechanic, with a wife and daughter Gertrude.

John was well liked by the men. One day while Cora Caxton, the millowner's daughter, was walking along near his house, Schmidt, who was haranguing the crowd, broke into a storm of abuse at her good clothes and luxury, and he and some others scared the child into a panic. Strong calmed them and took the child into his house to protect her. Here she was confronted for the first time with the life of the poor; it touched her heart and she immediately became the friend of the little family. So impressed was she with Gertrude, that Strong and his wife granted her request to take Gertrude to the Caxton mansion on a visit. There she met the owner, and after many questions, he began to wake up to the true state of affairs.

He summoned McBride by messenger. Scarcely had the note left the house when Schmidt sneaked up and began to ignite a bomb on the step. It sputtered and in a moment would have reduced the house to powder but for John Strong, who, like the quiet hero he was, picked up the deadly thing and threw it away. McBride, seeing him with the infernal thing, immediately summoned an officer, accusing him of the attempted crime. He was taken before Caxton, who, in a rage, ordered him to prison. But the children have observed the action from the window and clear him as the real culprit, Schmidt, is brought in by an officer. Needless to say, Caxton is grateful to their preserver, and is willing to meet any demand that John Strong may make; but John says: "All I want is a square deal for the men." Caxton agrees and taking John out on the front steps where the crowd of workmen have congregated assures them of his friendship, and furthermore discharges McBride and takes John and Gertrude in his own automobile and goes with them to the humble cottage to convey the joyful news to John's wife.

determine to make Bill marry her. The cowboys get a minister, take Bill to the girl's house and insist on his marrying her. The girl surprises them by saying that she don't want to marry him. Jack arrives on the scene. He and the girl make up, and the astonishment of the cowboys is great. They then turn on the tattler who caused the misunderstanding. They take him to the river and throw him over from the bridge into the muddy stream.

A GAME OF HEARTS. Mabel, a wealthy young girl, is engaged to be married to Arthur, a young broker. Tom Murray, a mounted policeman, is engaged to be married to Myrtle Jones, a stenographer.

The rich girl is out driving in the park. Her horse runs away with her, and Murray, the policeman, dashes after the runaway horse and saves the girl's life at the risk of his own. Mabel is very much impressed by the policeman.

The policeman's sweetheart goes to work for Arthur, the other girl's fiance, who becomes her ardent admirer. Meanwhile the friendship between Murray, the policeman, and Mable, the rich girl, progresses.

A clerk of the broker also in love with the pretty little stenographer, sends a note to Mabel that brings her to Arthur's office, where she discovers him making love to Myrtle. She breaks off the engagement and he pretends to be heartbroken, but dances for joy when she leaves the room. Then Myrtle catches her lover, the policeman, flirting with the rich girl in the park. Myrtle gives the policeman his ring and she goes off angry.

In two delightful comedy scenes the broker makes love to the typist, and wins her, and then the policeman wins the rich girl. It is a fair exchange of lovers.

The runaway and rescue scenes of this picture will make it a feature. The comedy situations will bring many laughs.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

THE LUCKY SHOT.—Jack Hunt, the son of a wealthy woman, falls in love with Nell Horsley, who is in the chorus of a musical comedy. They are married, but when Jack's mother is informed, she declares she will have nothing to do with Nell, although she is willing to forgive her son. But Jack sticks to his wife, and for a time they are very happy. Then Jack, who is in the militia, is called out on strike duty, and meets his death during a fight with strikers. The widow takes the news to her mother-in-law, who nevertheless retains her hatred for Nell, despite the tragedy. As time passes, Mrs. Hunt becomes a miser. She disposes of all her property, receiving in exchange money and jewels which she hides in a secret place in her room. In the meantime Nell has a hard time to get along and keep a roof over her head and that of her little boy. So desperate are her circumstances that she finally sinks her pride and appeals to her mother-in-law. The old woman repulses her again; her fit of rage brings on a stroke of apoplexy, and she drops dead after Nell leaves. All her property goes to little George, as the woman left no will, but search fails to locate anything except the family homestead. Nell is about to sell that, when she makes a discovery. Playing "Indian" with her boy, she shoots arrows aimlessly about the room. One of them hits the secret spring of the treasure vault, and the accident puts the boy and his mother beyond want for the rest of their lives.

THE CONVERTED DEACON.—May Sanders is the daughter of a farmer, Deacon Sanders, who is nearly as poor as he is religious. May goes to the city to seek employment, and her father warns her to shun theaters and bad company. Her first job is as a maid in the home of Mrs. Carr, wife of a theatrical manager. Mrs. Carr discovers that May can sing and dance exceptionally well, and her husband places May on the stage. She makes a hit right from the start. Also she annexes the affections of John De Lacy, a wealthy young man. But she does not dare to tell her parents of her new vocation. Matters drag along until the Deacon unexpectedly arrives in town. May has still pretended to be a maid of Mrs. Carr, and the father finds her in the house when he calls. He tells her that her mother is ill, and she is needed at home. She goes, and is promptly put to work on the farm. John follows his sweetheart to the country, and to be near her pretends to be poor, and secures a job on the farm. A newspaper gives the Deacon a clue to the mystery, and he prepares to disown his daughter. But when she sings and dances, his anger melts, he forgives May and John, who later marry with the parental blessing.

CENTAUR

GRANDDAD'S EXTRAVAGANCE.—No king upon his throne held greater sway over his subjects than did this little shaver over his granddaddy. His every whim was fulfilled, his every desire gratified, and to such an extent that he became a veritable little tyrant in the rule of his nursery; but with it all his love for his granddad was deep and beautiful. They were children together and when out of sight of housekeeper and stern parent, they romped and played like a couple of "kiddies"—the one past eighty, the other not eight.

Every dollar the old gentleman could lay hands on was spent for toys, and even in his loving and lovable extravagance would order send some C. O. D. the costliest playthings he could choose. Fairs fleet, and business failures and worries, so preyed upon his son's mind and temper that he became embittered toward the old man. When in despair upon receiving notice of his bankruptcy he received on top of it a bill for toys bought by the grandfather, his rage knew no bounds, and dashing into the nursery where the old and young kid were kneeling in worship before the glorious new toys he ordered the old man out of the house.

The boy stealthily follows, brings back the old man and feeds him his bread and milk. The father takes in the situation, and realizing that one day his son might perhaps turn him out in his old age, his heart melts and he kneels, beg going forgiveness of both his Maker and his father.

THE BADGERS. We all know that flirting even at its best is most detestable. Oftentimes we are liable to overlook what is called "innocent flirting," but when all is considered the safest plan is not to flirt. There is a class of "masher" like our hero Archie, that is to be found in every city, and his type is by no means an obscure one; on the contrary, he is seen in the street, the cafes, the theater, the public parks and on street corners. His dress is as immaculate as his conceit is colossal. He spends half his time primping before a mirror and the other half parading himself for the edification of the public. There is also another class of paraders, and they he in wait for the other class. Archie is of the former and George and Caroline of the latter.

In this particular perambulation Archie was attracted by Caroline and she apparently by him; he followed her to her home and upon her invitation entered her apartment. She leads him on, and because of his asinine conceit and her art, worked for the purpose, the fool makes violent and comical love to her. At the crucial moment George, her husband, breaks in upon the scene, and what is the result? These human badgers feed upon the human donkey and despoil him of all his money and valuables to salve over, as they express it, their wounded honor.

The lesson, while keen and positive, is also enjoyable because of its farce.

NOTES FROM THE MANUFACTURERS

SELIG NOTES.

The camera staff left on Monday night for Reno, witnessing the big mill and accidentally securing the best fight picture ever recorded in the history of the ring.

The Selig Polyscope Company secures the big Elks' Carnival and Grand Lodge meeting in Detroit and promises a very interesting film, ready for early release. As there will be representatives from every State in the Union, this should prove an interesting subject for the exhibitor, with which to work up a regular B. P. O. E. night.

The new buildings at the Chicago plant are nearing completion and will soon present a sight to picture men that will astonish many and remain a monument to picturedom for some time to come. The new addition enlarges the present plant by 60,000 square feet of floor space, adding new studios, wardrobe, stock and producing rooms, twenty finely appointed dressing rooms, library, green room and other features new to the motion picture business.

"Ranch Life in the Great Southwest" has brought forth more inquiries and comment as regards date of release, than anything the Selig Polyscope Company have prepared for the market in some time. It clearly demonstrates that when Selig announces a real cowboy picture the public knows what to expect, especially since it is a known fact that such well known people as Henry Grammar, Tom Mix, Chas. Eppa, Johnny Mullens, Pat Long and others were especially engaged at a big expense for this picture. This subject will be released within a very short time and we predict a record run.

LUBIN NOTES.

"Rosemary," scheduled for release the 18th, is one of the first subjects made in the new Lubin studio to be shown. The interior photography has all of the photographic excellence of the exteriors and is but the forerunner of other equally good films. It is something more, however, than an example of perfect photography, for both in matters of action and stage direction the film is unusually good.

The Lubin directors have in preparation a Western story that is calculated to wipe out all existing records and establish a new one that it will be hard to beat. It is a mining camp story very much out of the ordinary. It will appear some time in August. The productions will be made with even more than the usual care and will employ a cast of about forty.

PATHE NOTES.

The weekly programs of films released by Pathe Freres continue to show big improvement, and the method of selection they adopted last April is certainly bringing forth good results. For the benefit of those who do not know, we will state here that Pathe Freres are in a different position to any other manufacturer. Their American house receives about 9,000 feet of new film per week from their studios in France, Italy, Germany, and Russia, of which the American house only requires 3,000 feet a week after allowing for the release by them of the American production. These 3,000 feet are carefully selected by a committee of the heads of the various departments, every sample being run off on the machine and discussed and voted on separately. Taking thus only one-third of the European output, it can easily be seen that they only take the cream of it and consequently every film is, more or less, a feature. Not only this but they are enabled to vary their programs to suit all tastes. In addition to an American production, a certain amount of educational and travel films appear each week. There are also, as a rule, three comedies of merit, and the rest of the program consists of those dramas and spectacular films for which Pathe Freres are famous. A certain amount of this film is colored. There is no manufacturer in the world that has the facilities of Pathe Freres for making pictures of interest, and the American exhibitor thus enabled to obtain the cream of their output should take good care that he does get it. Pathe Freres are the firm that boomed the film business of this country, and deserve all the recognition of the fact that exchanges and exhibitors can give them. Pathe Freres were the first to place titles and subtitles on their films; the first to make regular releases on regular release dates, the first to release a reel at a time, the first to introduce posters for films; the first to produce colored pictures; the first to give advance information to the exhibitor and issue a weekly bulletin; the first to get out a trade paper; and lastly and most important, the first to get in touch with the exhibitor and study his requirements.

MELIES NOTES.

The Melies release for July 14 is a strong Western drama so dear to the hearts of the picture patrons. It is entitled "The Golden Secret," which has reference to a lost gold mine, the secret of which belongs to a Navajo Indian. The Indian has been befriended by two young settlers who find him starving in the desert, and when later he dies, he imparts the secret of the mine to them. This information is overheard by a rascally prospector, who trails them to the mine, overpowers them and races away to file the claim for himself. A quick-witted girl beats him, however, as she swings on a rope down the side of the mountain while the prospector is riding down, secures a horse and reaches the land office ahead of him. The scenery is excellent, the riding superb and the acting well up to the high standard set by the Melies director. Watch for "A Postal Substitute" on July 21. This is a story of a young girl, who, finding that her lover has been drugged, takes his place as a carrier for Uncle Sam and rides with the mail. Another great Western release on July 28 is "The Woman in the Case," which has to do with a borax discovery on a young woman's ranch.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

The most wonderful shot ever recorded, next to the far-famed William Tell, is that in "The Lucky Shot," a Thanhouser subject released Tuesday, July 12. Said shot is announced as "a shot that found a fortune, a shot that brought prosperity, a shot that made success to cut of darkness and right into day." Truly a puzzling kind of shot, if the producer's description is true. And it really seems to be. Here's why. The picture tells the story of a young man of social position who weds a dancer and is promptly disowned by his aristocratic mother. A member of the militia, he is called out on strike duty and killed in a riot. The penniless widow goes to the mansion of her husband's law and implores the assistance that is not due. The old woman, who has become a miser, does it turns the young widow away. In fact, her rage is so bitter that it induces a stroke of apoplexy, which results fatally.

As she left no will, the property goes to the grandchild, the widow's tiny son, but search fails to reveal anything except the family mansion. The widow concludes to sell that when the boy comes to figure in the story. Playing "Indian" in the mansion with his dog, she shoots arrows aimlessly about the room. One of them strikes the secret spring of the treasure vault, and the accident puts the boy and his mother beyond want for the remainder of their days.

THE CALL OF THE WEST.

Basil Chapelle alone knew the cause of his partner's despair. He had read it between the lines of Miss Patterson's letter telling her intended she could not get away from her social duties and bring Little Margaret to Elk Hill till the end of the season. This had thrown Paterson into a rage and just as the doctor had foretold, death had been the penalty. Six months later, when Miss Patterson arrived to look after her late husband's interests, Chapelle congratulated himself that it had cost him no twinge. His wife and daughter had not taken the hardship to the mountains wisely and one pet dog, and had they known about the battle waged within the cabinet regent of little Margaret, Chapelle felt she would speedily be invited to return East. This winsome baby (cradled had been responsible for his partner's changed vest, one and all at the moment had fallen under the dancer's spell. Even Jesse was picking flowers with the tot when the horses got started and Mrs. Williams, with the widow leaning on her arm. Mrs. Patterson was quite welcome to Jack Wilbur and the other boys but Jesse Evans had to attention of giving up without a struggle. Quiet as a mouse she waited after them only to discover she had been entirely too hasty, for Jesse was showing the lady her interest in the ranch, very much against his will; angered at discovering this, the widow left the lovers to themselves and made her way to the house as best she could, while Lynch and Jesse instantly became entirely oblivious to all but themselves. In the meanwhile, little Margaret, hungry, tired and heat-stricked, can into down to rest, and it was thus Jack Wilbur found the child, the latter half sobbing with sobs, as he turned to take her to the others the boys had by chance, seized and bound the supposed man. Ignorant of the fact that Margaret had been left in the woods by Evans, that cowherd Wilbur had carried the baby away for revenge on account of his being discharged and also because of his quarrel with Mrs. Patterson. It was therefore exceedingly lucky for all concerned that Evans reached some rest as they brought the child back and not only exonerated the thoroughly Wilbur, but aroused upon her father taking him back. Tragic scenes, it had been an excellent lesson for Mrs. Patterson, and as her little daughter crept into her arms, she realized for the first time how wonderfully precious that little daughter was to her.

MIRROR PICTURE SCREEN

HOW TO INCREASE YOUR BOX OFFICE RECEIPTS—PLEASE YOUR PATRONS

Human Life Photography

Patent Mirror Screen came in good shape. I would not take $1,000.00 for it if I could not buy another. I have opposition, but the Mirror Screen makes his picture look like 30 cents.
Very truly,
S. G. SMITH, New Lexington, Ohio.

How is it all done? The MIRROR SCREEN IS THE ANSWER. It ReflectS, MagnifieS, TransmitS and IntensifieS ExpressioN, BringS PictureS to LifE.

Many cities have taken up this question—"How Can the Picture Theatres Be Better Lighted"? For moral reasons we demand light during performances. The MIRROR SCREEN is the solution of this well taken reform.

RELIABILITY

RESPONSIBILITY

We want to tell our allies, the exhibitors, something about the business of our office. Notwithstanding that the Summer season is on, our customers seem to be doing a steadily increasing business.

THIS MEANS that exhibitors are joining the Independent ranks. They are realizing that and many of them are writing in to us directly to say that they are glad to have the opportunity to avail themselves of our program. We are putting out the strongest and most reliable program on earth, and it is only a question of a man's independence as to whether he joins us or not. We say to the exhibitor who has never tried an Independent service: "how'd you like people to avoid your theater in favor of a competitor's without ever having been in your place?"

WE HAVE THE GOODS

YOU WOULD ASK FOR A CHANCE

wouldn't you? Therefore it ill becomes you to have an opinion of Independent service unless you've tried our latest combined program of TWENTY NINE REELS WEEKLY.

A Mad Dog Scare

TWO COMEDIES ON ONE REEL

Josiah Brown and a few of the small town lights are seated in front of the village grocery arguing the merits and demerits of the present Congress when their attention is called to an article in the "Weekly Bugle" just published, warning the populace to beware of mad dogs. Each of the four remembers seeing the dogs in question and begins to feel shaky. A city chap, a drummer from the East, who had arrived the night before, sees an opportunity to wake up Sleepy Hollow and at the expense of the superstitious of the corner grocery clientele. Accordingly he enlists the services of the town pump comedian and they tie tin cans to the two most ferocious looking dogs in the village, who at once start on a rampage, running over people and creating more excitement than a circus parade in Mudville. Josiah, big and fat, was a special mark for the frenzied dog, and in the excitement loses a half-yard from his trousers. He is more than sure that he was bitten. The whole town is in a turmoil. Going home, the family fly from the house; finally, almost exhausted from excitement, he is roped by the populace and tied on a chair. The town constable sits as a death watch to see that he does not chew the ropes off. The dog is killed and shipped for examination. Three days later a telegram is received that the dog had no hydrophobia, but only suffered from a case of fleas. Joshua is released amid general tumult and returns to the fond embraces of his family. (Length, 690 feet.)

On the same reel is

A Sleep Walking Cure

A spinster hits upon a plan to cure sleep-walking. Accordingly places a tub full of water at the foot of the stairs. Everyone falls in but the right one. Finally it serves to catch a burglar and proves the efficiency of the old maid's idea. (Length, 310 feet.)

The Cowboy's Stratagem

A DRAMA OF THE WEST

Bob loves Mab and his love is returned, but, as usual, the course of true love fails to run smooth. Bob and two of his cowboy friends go on a fishing and hunting trip in the Platte River bottoms. On their way they stop at the post-office. An Eastern lady out horseback riding stops to ask Bob for directions. Mab sees Bob apparently paying marked attentions to the lady. Her jealousy is aroused. Bob follows her home, explains, and the cloud blows over. Bob pops the question, Mab accepts, and the ring is given.

The Eastern lady's horse runs away with her. Bob makes a heroic rescue and Mab for the second time in one day finding cause for jealousy, returns Bob's ring and goes away in anger. Bob's companions come upon a bear, and as Steve's gun fails to work, the boys return to camp and find Bob in a good humor to vent his anger on a bear or anything else that will prove an outlet for his feelings.

After finding and shooting the bear, Bob hits on a happy scheme to square matters with Mab, and it is this plan that gives our picture story its name, "A Cowboy's Stratagem." It's a "corker," and for genuine merit and scenic environment will be found a true Selig, consequently in a class by itself.

The Picture and the Children.

The public schools of the country closed at the end of last month and many millions of children were let loose on the community, either to make holiday on the coast or in the country or to roam the streets of the cities and townships. The consequence is that any intelligent foreigner visiting New York City just now will be simply amazed at the number of children who are in the streets for the purpose of amusing themselves as best they can and of annoying adults by their noises, their pranks and their general restlessness.

It is a great problem, that of what to do with small children in the long Summer vacation. Every tired mother knows what it means. Fortunately the school authorities of New York City take a humane view of the situation. They open the playgrounds of the schools for a certain part of the day, and this has the effect of drawing off the little ones from the streets. We are writing this almost in sight of a large public school in the city and it is consoling to see the avidity with which the small children take advantage of the facilities offered them for enjoying themselves in an enclosed place for an hour or two with swings and the like.

Some of the schools, too, manage to give the little ones something in the nature of a small entertainment before they are released for the evening. This also is a good thing in its way. It has occurred to us that this would be a good opportunity for giving children a little mild education in vacation time by utilizing empty schools for the exhibition of educational moving pictures, which fortunately abound in considerable numbers. The expense would not be great. The hall or school room would cost nothing, current is available, cost of the films would not be great, whilst operating talent could be had at a reasonable outlay.

We hear and read much about the intention of the scholastic authorities of the country to utilize the moving picture for educational purposes. The time is probably not yet ripe when the moving picture can be included in the daily curriculum of public schools. But we believe that during the long vacation a tentative effort could be made to reach the minds of the young people in the manner we suggest. The children are practically doing nothing for something like ten weeks, during the Summer months, whereas if the schools could be utilized for an occasional exhibition of educational moving pictures, the streets would be cleared of the little ones and some good would be done to their minds by concentrating them upon an attractive form of instruction.

Nearly everybody shares the experience graphically described by Hoffman in his article in a recent number of the WORLD. Not only do the teachers of the schools, when they are open, listen to the small people talking about the picture, but other members of the community outside the schools. In these last few weeks we have found ourselves in contiguity with large numbers of children released from school. What is their chief topic of conversation? The moving picture! Or if it is not, you have only to mention the picture to them and off their young minds start to conjure up all sorts of anticipations and expectations as to what they are to see when they see a picture. Indeed, the tired mother, before referred to, probably finds no readier means of pacifying a rebellious child, than by promising him or her a nickel wherewith sight of the much-prized picture can be obtained. It seems to us that nothing on earth appeals so forcibly to the juvenile mind as the picture, potent though such influences as the seashore, Coney Island, automobiles, aeroplanes and ships may be. The picture transcends them all in popular interest. It holds and attracts the juvenile mind where other agencies meet with only partial success. "Give me the child," says the Jesuit, "and I will mould the man or woman." "Give us the child," say we of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, "and we will make a life-long friend of that child for the moving picture."

Time and again we advert to this theme of interesting the children in the best aspects of the moving picture for the reason that we think it is good for the children and for the picture. The child yields his interest, is won over to the cause and the business thrives thereby and is solidified for the future. Let anybody who has the opportunity do what we have done on many occasions, and that is to scrutinize the face of an intelligent child of seven or eight who sees a good moving picture for the first time. Unmistakeably you will read such wonderment, such surprise on the child's face as to convince you that it is worth a great deal to maintain such an interest as this in the virgin mind of to-day which is to be the fructifying mind of the future.

An esteemed correspondent wrote us the other day drawing attention to the fact that she—for our correspondent was a lady—saw what she assumed to be a naturally colored moving picture, of which she spoke in terms of the highest praise. We had no difficulty in identifying the picture as one of Messrs. Pathe's productions. All who know the beauty of the Pathe colored pictures will join our fair correspondent in her admiration for those results. Monochrome in moving picture may be applauded and appreciated without stint, but it is inevitable that sooner or later it will have to yield the palm to polychromatic pictures. There are physiological reasons for this which we are under promise to treat in a future article. Our advertisement pages, for some time past, have announced the imminent introduction of kinemacolor to the American public, and this week we are in receipt of a batch of literature bearing on the subject. Moreover, we believe that within the last few days a series of demonstrations of kinemacolor subjects have been given in New York for the edification of vaudeville and other magnates, who no doubt require some education in the possibilities of this beautiful process. We shall doubtless hear more of the effect which the process makes upon the lay mind a little later when the arrangements of the Kinemacolor Company of America are perfected.

Meanwhile, we should like to say that we are glad to see signs of the early introduction of kinemacolor to the American public. It is not our object in this article to discuss the pros and cons of the process, from a scientific or technical standpoint. This has been done before. The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it, and kinemacolor will stand or fall in this country entirely upon its merits. What we are particularly concerned in at this moment is to welcome the process to the market and to record the fact of its so being placed there, because it is bound to have a great effect on the future of the picture. If kinemacolor is the success that it is hoped to be, the public will demand colored pictures in increasing numbers. We never expect to see the time when color will wholly replace monochrome in the picture, any more than oil paintings or water color paintings will displace black and white work in graphic art. There are numerous subjects made by the moving picture which are best translated in monochrome. On the other hand, there is a wealth of material that looks all the better, and all the more convincing, when translated in color, especially natural color. It is here that kinemacolor or colored stencil or natural color work steps in.

There is another reason why we welcome kinemacolor into the field, and it is this: We think it will be instrumental in bringing the picture to the notice of a large class who do not at present study the picture, and therefore it will act in a manner of speaking as something of an uplifter. We believe that it is the intention of the executive staff of the Kinemacolor Company of America to approach the public through vaudeville houses, lecture halls and the like and not through the ordinary moving picture theater. In this case an entirely different public will be reached from that which patronizes moving picture theaters, and consequently interest in the picture will be stimulated and strengthened.

Our exchanges show that kinemacolor is meeting with success in the British Isles and on the continent of Europe. A picture in kinemacolor was obtained of the late King Edward's funeral which is to be shown in this country very shortly. The possibilities before the process are great and in the interests of the business we hope to see them realized.

Square Pegs and Round Holes.

Photography—that is, stationary photography—was years ago defined as an "art-science." It is a clumsy word, but it expressed the meaning of those who some thirty-five or forty years ago realized that in the making of a photograph something more than mere manipulative or mechanical knowledge was demanded. It amounted to this, in short: Though you could use your camera intelligently, develop your negative and make a print, yet the result was bound to be poor, wooden or generally unsatisfactory, unless a certain amount of artistic and scientific knowledge was brought to bear in the work. In other words, you had to properly compose and light your picture; you had to accurately expose, develop and print it. The composition and lighting came under the heading of "Art" and other things under that of "Science." To-day, the phrase "Art-Science" is seldom heard of. Your educated photographer, whatever he does, be it portraits, interiors, landscapes or the like, may be generally regarded as a cultured craftsman with the technique of his work at his finger tips. He may think or talk art or science, but what he does is the manifestation of craftsmanship. That is to say, to a knowledge of artistic principles he adds that of the possibilities of his lens, plates, printing and developing processes.

Now, the modern photographer whose best work is shown along Fifth avenue, has only arrived at that stage of development and craftsmanship after a long apprenticeship. Trace your successful photographer back to his primality and you will find in the majority of instances that he just "butted in" in a humble way and became one of those things described in the caption of this article, "a square peg in a round hole." He was all sharp corners and edges who knew nothing of the art and the technique of his subject, so failure, disaster, perseverance, gradual success and experience rounded off those sharp edges and the peg finally fitted the hole. In other words, out of chaos and incompetency a finished craftsman was evolved. We know photographers who commenced their career as tin typers, dark-room assistants, doormen, but they have gone through the mill and are now finished delineators of the "400." But it was hard work and it took them years to rub off those sharp edges.

Much the same sort of thing is happening in the moving picture field to-day, or rather it has been happening since this time last year. As we pointed out last week, the Independent side has attracted a considerable number of new manufacturers with capital, enterprise, brains and ability. These in their turn are engaging and have engaged bands of more or less expert technical and artistic helpers. But, alas, observation and contact with these people shows us clearly that here again we have the old story unfolded before us, "square pegs in round holes." It is positively disheartening to contemplate how many enterprising Independent manufacturers are at the mercy of help of small experience and still smaller capacity for learning. As we have said over and over again, the making of moving pictures from the time the handle of the camera is turned to the time when the finished positive is dried and ready for exhibition—this work is by no means easy or simple. It is regrettable that so much of it perforce must be entrusted to partially incompetent hands simply for the reason, of course, that high-class expert help is not a drug in the market. In other words, the moving picture field is not over-crowded with good camera men, photographers, producers, painters and the like.

These square pegs in round holes must adapt themselves to the needs of the case before the best possibilities of the moving picture are extracted by the newest manufacturers. The making of a photograph of a kind is, as we have pointed out before, comparatively easy, though not absolutely easy; the making of a picture that will pass rigid criticism in the way of composition, lighting, exposing, developing, tinting, toning—the technique of the subject, is very difficult indeed and can only be accomplished by the scientific method as opposed to mere guesswork. In other words, the subject must be understood.

We know something of the difficulties of those who set out to make moving pictures. We have watched their help at work; we know the heart-breaking failures which never see the light of publicity, of the errors in exposure, in developing, in printing, and of the pathetic waste of film, of the pointless stories, of the mis-edited or unedited film, and releases not released, of, in short, money thrown down the sink due to the failure of the help to make good. We know all this, and that is why we write this article by way of sympathy for those manufacturers who are struggling against the ignorance of those upon whom a restricted market forces them to rely. They have our sympathy. But the lesson, though stern and bitter, is a valuable one. It is this: That only the best can succeed. Only the best is wanted in the modern moving picture field, therefore these square pegs in round holes must either be abolished or must adapt themselves to circumstances. The stern contest of quality has set in with remorseless severity on the Independent side. It is a good time of year to bring this matter to the fore and to impress upon the Independent manufacturer that the problem before him now and henceforth is that of quality, again QUALITY, and always QUALITY of picture.

Ante-Deluvianism and the Picture.

Nobody, we suppose, who reads this paper or who is acquainted with the personalities of those responsible for its production can twit us with lack of patriotism. "Breathes there the man with soul so dead, who never to himself hath said: 'This is my own, my native land!'" This means, of course, the land where one was born. Patriotism of this kind is a primal instinct and always remains with one, even though, for convenience sake, one changes one's nationality or form of nationality—not an unknown thing in the United States to-day.

For reasons made plain in the foregoing paragraph, we have always wanted to see the British picture take a place of prominence on the American market, and secure a share of American business just as the American picture is securing a share—and a very large share—of British business, which the American pictures obtain on their merits. But over and over again in these pages, and elsewhere, we have felt it our duty to point out that the British-made picture was not on its merits entitled to a share of American business. We have pointed out that its photography was below that of the highest American standard, and that the dramatic subjects were undramatic, the stories and their method of treatment being absolutely unsuitable to the American market.

What was the result of this action on our part? We were denounced for our bias against the English picture. We were told that we held a brief for the American production. We were contradicted by new entrants into the manufacture of moving pictures who were not heard of until yesterday, whilst we, who write this, have been following the progress of the picture for the last thirteen or fourteen years. More than that, some of our esteemed English contemporaries have gone out of their way to exalt the British picture, and to blind themselves to evident facts, namely, that even in Britain the British picture holds a secondary place, whilst in the United States and other countries it is barely tolerated.

That, however, our attitude in this matter was justified is at last evidenced by the practical admission of one of our London contemporaries which prints several letters condemnatory of the British picture and deploring the fact that in Britain most of the pictures exhibited are of foreign make. This is a melancholy fact, reflecting little or no credit upon English manufacturers of films who are "trailing the procession" with a vengeance. In other words, they are years behind their French, German, Italian and American competitors.

Here in the United States there is such a sympathetic disposition towards anything, one might say everything, that is English, that we deplore the apathy of the English makers in this respect. Fancy now, that it is to an American house such as the Vitagraph Company that the splendid film of "Becket" which we noticed last week is due! Good Lord, there are English film makers working within a few miles of Canterbury Cathedral! yet not one of them seems to have seized upon the opportunity of making a "Becket" picture. Again, it was an American film maker who adapted Wilkie Collins' novel, "The Moonstone." American film makers have illustrated Dickens and Scott, as well as Shakespeare. They are illustrating the Bible. They are ransacking the world of literature, poetry and art for suitable subjects. What are the British makers doing—those British makers who have such a beautiful world of subjects at their very doors? What are they doing to uphold the best aspects of the picture? Absolutely nothing. As we write this, the hum of progress is heard in this land. The licensed manufacturers are doubling the sizes of their plants; the Independent manufacturers are plunging into the great competition of quality. The American business is on the boom. In England people are writing to the representative organ of the trade and asking, "Where is the English film?" And echo answers: "Where?"

We know that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is read, and very frequently read, throughout the whole of the English film trade. We ask all the manufacturers who read this article to believe us when we say that we are acting in their best interests, when we beseech them to, in the American locution, "get busy," and make good, well-acted pictures, which can compete with the American pictures shown on the British market. When they do this their films will stand a chance of success here in the United States. Except in very special instances they are not doing so at present, and that is why so little is seen or heard of the British moving picture in North America and other parts of the world.

DRUMS AND TRAPS.

By H. F. HOFFMAN.

I'm going to take a fall out of the man behind the drums to-day. Some weeks ago I took a fall out of the operators and they have never forgiven me. I do not despise the operator, because I have been one myself and know the ups and downs of it. Neither do I despise the trap drummer, because I am one myself. It was the drums that gave me my start in the amusement world, and it is to them, directly or indirectly, that I owe many fond memories and some knowledge of the world, both at home and beyond the seas. There is nothing I love better than to sit in a big band and go through a heavy overture, but I always seemed to be able to make more money doing something else.

The advent of the moving picture theater brought the services of tympanists into very sudden demand. The demand was greater than the supply, and consequently, to fill up the gaps, many raw recruits were pressed nto service. Most of them served their purpose by making a noise of some kind, and it is barely possible that among the lot there may be a certain percentage who will in time become first class performers. Therefore, in case this article is scanned by the old-time drummer, whatever I may have to say of an instructive nature is put down for the benefit of this new crop of tympanists and not to demonstrate any superior wisdom to the oldsters, although some of these, too, have their faults which may be mentioned therein.

There are two general classes of drumming; the regimental, or military, and the professional, or band and orchestra. For the purposes of this article we may as well dismiss the regimental in a few words. While it is the lower of the two classes of drumming, it is the best training school for future professionals that I know of, so far as technical skill is concerned. It does not make a musician of a man, but it teaches him how to handle his sticks. It teaches him the various beats and rolls, from the five to the eleven stroke, and other tricks that a man who considers himself a full-fledge should know, but at the same time a regimental course is not absolutely necessary. The close roll is the easiest to master and if you get that down fine you have your start for indoor work.

In drumming, as in every craft, there is a right and wrong way. It varies from the laborious thump to the skillful and sympathetic touch of the artist; the difference between the employment of mere muscle and brains. The drummer who executes well but does not know his notes is almost sure to be a thumper, or "athletic drummer," as the wise ones say. The kind who imagines that the audience came there to hear him and him only. His object is to drown the piano player and prove his worth by the amount of noise he can make, and he always succeeds. Later, when he learns his notes, his noisy fault is apt to abide with him, and that is why we have so many irritating men behind the drums at moving picture houses. This is particularly true when he comes to playing the bells. On more than one occasion, in some of the biggest and best houses, I have listened to the most ear-splitting hammering on bells, ranking second in noise only to the circus calliope.

All this noise is unnecessary. The drummer must learn that he is only a subordinate item and should keep his proper place. The singer who yells his lungs out and the cornet player who blows his head off are much scarcer than the drummer who drowns out the pianist. The skillful man with the delicate touch can put life into a show that the other man would kill. The real drummer knows that a drum tap carries very far and he does not overdo it. If you watch him you will notice that his elbows never move; he can play for hours with nothing but the motion of his wrists, and his clean, even roll is like the patter of raindrops on a tin roof. He also knows the value of acceut and is always playing with light and shade: short crescendos are his stock in trade and occasionally he gives his bass drum a moment's rest instead of pounding straight through like a machine from start to finish.

When the finished player handles his bells he gets the sweetness out of them by his lightness of touch, and if he can keep the sound down to the tinkle of a music box the effect with piano is very pretty. In like manner he handles his triangle, clogs, castanets, tambourine and all minor accessories, which are very musical if they are kept down below the battering point.

Sound effects come in for some of the most stupid handling of all, both by professionals and novices. The most abused of any is the horse-hoof imitation. It is almost funny to observe the diligence with which some prop-workers watch a horse when he comes into the picture. Every step is caught with a keenness that soon attracts the attention of the audience to the horse's feet and away from the actors. The lover may be pleading with the Squire's daughter to elope with him, during which the horse is grazing in the background, but nevertheless every step that horse takes must be faithfully recorded by the loud pop of a cocoanut shell, without regard whether the horse be walking on ground, gravel or ganite.

Without judgment in the use of sound effects they are worse than none at all. Where a sound will have a direct bearing and effect upon something that is happening in a picture, such as the ringing of a door bell, the shot of a gun, wind in a storm, etc., then by all means come in with it strong, but on the other hand, when you see a calf in the background of a pretty farm scene don't detract from the acting by jangling a cow bell when it has no bearing on the picture. If your bass wants it, muffle it inside a box and you will get the right effect. The horse-hoof is all right for a runaway or exciting gallop, such as a fire apparatus in motion, but don't overdo it. If you stop to think, a man walking on a pavement makes nearly as much noise as a horse and you do not think it necessary to imitate him at all.

I was lecturing once at a large theater that held a thousand people on the ground floor and it required some vocal effort on my part. Behind the screen they had a prop-worker who felt the importance of his position, very much to my discomfort. He never missed a horse's step; every time a door closed he would rap on a box; the waiter's tip always jingled on the table; the chickens out-cackled me; the cows "mooed" me into silence, and I was lost in the ocean's roar. I said nothing to him because he was peevish and very jealous of his playthings. One evening we had the interior scene of a peasant's cottage, and a painful parting between two lovers was taking place. All at once a bird began to sing with great violence. I looked at the piano player in wonderment and found him looking the same at me. "What's that for," he asked. "You've got me," I replied, "I'll go and see." I found my friend with his cheeks and his eyes bulging out, blowing for his very life. "What's the trouble?" says I. "The bird! The bird!" says he, without removing the whistle. "Where?" says I. "There!" says he, pointing triumphantly with a stick to a diminutive canary in a tiny wooden cage on a top shelf at the far corner of the room. "Good boy!" I cried, giving him a wallop on the back that made him almost swallow his blooming whistle.

If you err in sound effects it is better to err on the side of silence. Do not pay so much attention to trivial things just because they happen to be in the picture. Get in with the sound that ought to be there and play good drums for the rest. Furthermore, I notice that while many drummers imitate objects and animals very commendably, they seldom think of imitating a man. Whether they are afraid of the sound of their own voices or not, I cannot say, but there are many cases where a shout, a laugh, a command or a sneeze could be put in with the voice that are not taken advantage of at all.

In every craft the workman should have the best of tools and take the best care of them, but it seems to be the fate of drums, especially bass drums, to be sat upon, rained upon, worked upon, generally abused and left to shift for themselves. Some of the drums I have been listening to at picture houses could be replaced by butter tubs and the audience would never know the difference. You may have noticed that musicians on all other instruments take special care of them and are oftttimes inclined to brag a little about the rarity of their particular one, which means that they have tried a good many before they were entirely satisfied that they had selected the best that could be had. This is particularly true of violinists who guard their violins with jealous care and seldom trust them to other hands than their own for any reason whatever. Drummers are not usually so particular in this respect but the fact remains, nevertheless, that the best results cannot be obtained with poor drums. It is not so much a matter of cost as in the constant trying out of different ones until the rare one is found. There is not one drum in twenty that is worth owning.

Bass drums in particular almost always escape proper selection, being often ordered by mail to be of a certain height and depth in inches, instead of being personally tested for the deep toned vibration which carries that resonant musical boom to the farthest corners of the auditorium, no matter how lightly tapped. Needless to say, that the bigger the bass drum the better.

There is wide difference of opinion as to the relative merits of single and double headed drums, among professionals, but in the last analysis I believe that it all depends upon the man who uses them. The two headed drum has a softer and more musical quality and is much the easier to play upon. The single headed drum is harsh and you have to change your style to get anything out of them. There is very little bounce to them and therefore to get a rebound it is necessary to strike hard, and in striking hard too much noise is made, so it really requires muscular control and more skill to get music out of them than from the two headed kind, but they are fairly satisfactory when one gets used to them. The single headed bass drum is an atrocious failure. In the single headed tenor drum the vibration is small, but in the bass drum it is practically nil. One may as well have a barrel hoop with a skin stretched across, for all the sound you will get from either will be a dull, sickening thud.

By his cymbal you will know the drummer. After going the rounds and hearing the miserable chinkety-chink of the $1.50 brass cymbal it is a pleasure to come across a man who uses the real Turkish. The Turkish cymbal quivers and shivers for a full minute after being struck. It sings like a human voice and its song carries with a musical sweetness to the farthest corner. One of these coupled to a deep, full toned bass drum means a quality of tone that cannot be surpassed. One 12-inch Turkish cymbal will cost you in the neighborhood of $10, but you have my word for it that once you buy one you will cast away your brass or German silver, and love the song of the Turkish.

Pedals. There are many varieties, the principal fault of the majority being lost action. Nearly all of the knuckle joint pedals have this fault. One of the most reliable pedals is the old-time top rigging. There is no lost action to it and it answers the lightest touch of the toe with the most delicate response. On account of its bulk it is not used as much as formerly, but many old-timers still cling to it. A drummer must know his pedal as a mother does her child. There are no two in the world alike and it is difficult to get used to another man's apparatus. The principal sin in the use of the pedal is that of smothering the drum and cymbal. As with the piano key, the reaction should be instantaneous so as to give them a chance to vibrate. The moment your beater strikes the drum and cymbal get it out of the way and let them sing, otherwise you get that same old chink-chink-chink that is the sure sign of a careless drummer.

Charles L. Fuller, well known in the moving picture field, has formed a partnership with Frank L. Heller of theatrical experience—the Colonial Amusement Company—with headquarters at Tappan, N. Y. They intend to play one-night stands in small towns along the Hudson and one circuit has already started. With only pictures and songs they are sure to make a success of their venture. They would like to hear from a good pianist, also an operator who can quickly set up and connect machine.

Motion Pictures and the Drama in America.

By Perry N. Vekroff.

Of all the industries born during the last fifteen years, few have developed as rapidly and none under as many adverse conditions as the manufacture of motion pictures. Their advent into the amusement world in 1896 was greeted in an unfriendly manner by the critics as well as the theatrical managers. Never before did these display such keen interest in the morals of the public, until their patrons began to desert their theaters in order to crowd the motion picture parlors. War was thus declared against the rising industry and the pens of various religious enthusiasts gratefully encouraged. Several crusades followed. Some resulted in the suppression of a few picture parlors; others, in the arrest of their unscrupulous owners. As a rule, however, the presecution has helped the industry by stimulating its progress. To-day motion picture manufacturers may rightly be proud of their victory. For, in the face of powerful opposition, they have succeeded in developing a form of amusement which is not only rapidly equalling the legitimate drama in artistic excellence, but is threatening to eventually surpass it in educational usefulness. One needs but to look at the recent releases of the leading American and European firms to be convinced. The acting displayed in them is superb; the staging, magnificent; the themes intense, wholesome and inspiring. As for the purely educational films, their instructive value can be equalled only by their photographic veracity and excellence. It is not surprising that colleges and universities are rapidly being supplied with projecting machines, and that no school or church entertainment is now considered complete without "movies."

The drama, on the other hand, has been steadily deteriorating from the high moral standards which once distinguished our theaters from the theaters of other countries. The evil has been growing with such alarming rapidity and has already spread to such gigantic magnitude that drastic measures must be adopted at once. Such action becomes all the more urgent when we realize that this deterioration has been systematic and is threatening to maintain its course in spite of what the pulpit or the press may do to prevent it. No one who has watched the rapid succession into public vogue of the "Soul Kiss" waltzes, the "Sheath Gowned" choruses, the scantily clad "Salomes," the semi-nude models, the "Apache" dances, the orgies in "The Girl from Rector's" and "The Girl With the Whooping Cough"—can have failed to notice how readily theatergoers become hardened to salacious features. Nor is this moral gangrene confined to vaudeville and musical comedy alone. The poison has affected the legitimate drama as well. Of course, every objectionable novelty is met with the disapproval of the critics. But ethical scruples, when aroused merely by a denunciatory article or two in the magazines, seldom can resist the snares of an alluring system of publicity practiced by most of our successful theatrical managers. The public, therefore, invariably end by crowding the theaters and unblushingly enthusing over performances, the vulgarity and indecency of which would have never been tolerated a few years ago.

Of the many writers who have discussed the deterioration of the drama, some have blamed the public; others, the managers; others, the critics; and a considerable majority, the dramatists. Of course, none of these four factors of dramatic history can be exempted from a certain amount of responsibility. It would be unjust, however, to place the entire blame on any one in particular, each being dependent on the other three and none powerful enough to singly effect any material changes for the better or the worse. The public, for instance, owing to a misleading system of publicity, has practically no way of discriminating on plays until these have been seen. And even if it did, the privilege would be of small benefit as theatergoers are powerless of obtaining a square deal in the matter of purchasing seats, much less in asserting their preference for this or that play. No wonder, then, that theatergoers in their mad rush for amusement, as a rule are forced to accept whatever the managers offer. As for these latter, especially the newly sprouting, the problem of deciding on plays becomes harder and harder every day. For while the profits from a successful production are enormous, it must be remembered that the losses, in case of failure, are proportionately considerable. The average producer, therefore, in the face of established preferences for definite forms of amusment, cannot afford to experiment as a reformer, but adapts himself to prevailing conditions, regardless of personal ideals and artistic standards. The critics are equally helpless. They are laboring under coercion, brought upon by the policies of the papers or magazines by which they are employed, and which depend on various theatrical advertisements for a substantial income. Analogous to the case of the critic is the case of the dramatist. The latter seldom manages to have his own way about his work. As a rule, he writes "to order." In other words, he is furnished with a lot of "business" and situations which he is instructed to force into his work so as to make it fit the personality of the star of the play. Thus, in many cases, the dramatist becomes the scapegoat of the producer, by assuming the entire responsibility for all infringements on morality and dramatic technique.

From the preceding, then, it follows that the causes of the deplorable condition of the theater must be sought elsewhere, and not with the public, the managers, the critics, or the dramatists. It also follows that the measures to be adopted for the regeneration of the theater must come from other sources than the four factors just mentioned, and must be far more radical than their concerted action would be—were such action possible.

What, then, is responsible for the present anomalous state of the theater and what is to bring about its regeneration?. The laws of the country. Nothing short of adequate legislation can drag the theater out of its present commercial basis and restore it to its rightful place among other educational institutions. For, whether intended to be so or no, the theater, by virture of its didactic nature, has always been and always shall be a potent educational factor. And inasmuch as it is an educational factor, it is not expedient to abandon its tremendous possibilities to the mercy of unscrupulous managers, whose only qualifications as arbiters of the dramatic art seem to be their money and unlimited nerve. The production of sordid plays—no matter how true to life and technically perfect—is no more necessary in our theaters than would be the display of obscene paintings in our art galleries, or the circulation of licentious books in our public libraries. Nevertheless, any manager may produce almost any play now, provided he have the courage to take the financial risk.

Such promiscuous play producing, however, can easily be made impossible. The motion picture manufacturers have shown us the way, when they voluntarily organized the National Board of Censorship. This board, composed of representatives of all the leading American and European firms, has demonstrated beyond a doubt its practicability by the splendid work it has done toward uplifting the moral and artistic standards of the silent drama.

What has been done for the motion pictures can be done on a larger scale for the theater at large. Proper laws could be passed, recognizing it as a public institution and placing it under some specially appointed theatrical committee. This committee or committees, composed of competent theatrical and literary authorities, and headed by the Librarian of Congress, or, if he be impossible, by the State Superintendent for Public Instruction, could be invested with the power to exercise a liberal-minded but rigid system of censorship, whereby no play could be produced till found and pronounced good. In this manner, injurious plays could be eliminated at the very beginning of their career before reaching the public with their demoralizing influence.

The adoption of some such measure would not only efficiently and permanently protect the theater from immoral tendencies, but eventually become instrumental in the solution of such problems as the modification of the now prevalent "starring" system; the making of the theater a more accessible form of amusement and instruction for the masses; the abolition of ticket speculators and theatrical exchanges; the emancipation of deserving talent from the despotism of scheming managers; the elimination of the chaff from the wheat in the theatrical profession; the material as well as social betterment of the shameless underpaid average actor and actress, and many other salutary changes, too numerous to discuss here.

Picture Personalities.

MISS FLORENCE E. TURNER: THE VITAGRAPH GIRL.

"Divinely tall, and most divinely dark," we said to ourselves as we descended upon the Vitagraph studios, at Elm avenue, Flatbush, N. Y., with a fixed determination to track the famous Vitagraph girl to her native fastness, or rather, to be less heroic in the case of a lady, to her own particular stamping ground,—that is, the Vitagraph stage. For we had read, we had heard of her, we had seen her picture, and the mental conception that we had formed of her was of Juno-like dignity and other charming feminine attributes one likes to associate with the personality of a graceful player of that sex to which it is our misfortune not to belong. But, bless you, Miss Turner is no Juno, no Amazon, she is petite, dark, slender, vivacious, full of life and go, just as we see her on the stage, a right lively, good-natured and popular little woman, beloved by all the members of that very happy family which works at the Vitagraph studio, just as she is admired and adored by the millions of people who look upon her counterfeit presentiment on the moving picture screen.

She has a curious blend of nationalities, as she frankly confessed to us—Spanish, Italian, Scotch and American. Doesn't all this make for great natural histrionic ability? Assuredly. "Want my portrait?" she said, in response to our request. "Sure, you shall have it. I've got twenty or thirty of them on my desk downstairs. Come and take your pick when I am through with this act." And then the girl got to work. We had the pleasure of standing and watching her playing in one of the scenes of a forthcoming release, entitled "Auld Robin Gray." She was the pathetic slip of a girl, who, according to that song, married Auld Robin while her heart was in the possession of another and younger man. So there this fascinating girl stood, going through her part of attending her sick mother in bed, showing before the camera, with the practiced ease of a born actress, all the varying emotions of her part.

Miss Turner has a wide range of roles. She is pathetic, grotesque, humorous, sentimental. Now, she is a comical little Louie Frecar; now she is a tragedy queen, anon she is a woman of fashion. Her powers of makeup are varied and extensive. She can absolutely disguise her face or obliterate her own charming personality. She can be serious; she can romp; she can laugh; she can joke. Altogether a very delightful personality, quite naturally and properly popular.

Then what a smart little business woman she is. Right fresh from her own performance on the stage, she took command of the office, dealing with production matters, and seemed to be a perfect mistress of dealing with the needs of business and otherwise of her fellow performers who had gone through the day's work. Quite a gift for organizing work combined with histrionic ability. When we complimented her upon her performance in "Auld Robin Gray," she looked at us with a characteristic smile and said: "Ah, but you should see me in ——" and of sourse she invited us down to the studio again to see her in something else.

So this is the famous Vitagraph girl. We hope we have succeeded in conveying to our readers an impression, however perfunctory, of her very engaging personality. Besides the pictures that illustrate this article, we begged one of Miss Turner in propria persona for our own private collection. It would have done the reader good to hear the intensely clever way in which she simulated a possibly jealous member of the other sex, who discovered a portrait of a str-rrr-rrr-range woman in our possesion. But we do not have any truck with jealous members of the other sex. Florence Turner, however, is such a delightfully natural and lovable little actress that nobody in this world could possibly be jealous of her.

WANTED: A WORD.

Conan Doyle's stories of "Sherlock Holmes" are now presented on the stage. In order to make this possible, it was necessary that they be dramatized. But if this version were acted in front of the camera, the resultant film would be utterly unintelligible to the spectators unless they were already familiar with the story. In other words, a drmatized book is not necessarily suited for the cinematograph. Another transcription is necessary to make it understood. What word shall we use to designate this second step?

The Century Dictionary tells us that the word "cinematograph" is derived from the Greek words meaning "motion" plus "write," or "motion-writing" (i. e., "motion-photographing). Therefore, if we choose a word to express to "motion write-ize," we would have "cinematographize," which is too cumbersome. But why not use simply "motion-ize" in the Greek form and term the act of rendering a book or play intelligible when viewed in the silent drama by the word "Cinemize"?

GO TO HARLEM FOR A GOOD SHOW.

By F. H. Richardson.

At last, right here in "Little Old," I have found a show which I can compliment from start to finish, and you don't know how glad I was to discover it. It is not the most pleasant task in the world to be continually roasting. One likes to compliment at least some of the time. I therefore sat for the first half-hour in fear and trembling lest the excellence prove to be but a streak of luck on the part of the operator. Not so, however, praise be! and at the end of thirty minutes I could sit still no longer, but had to hunt up the manager and, somewhat later, go up and speak to the operator, thanking him for the genuine surprise and the genuine pleasure of what I had witnessed.

But to begin at the beginning: Last Saturday evening, in company with my "better half," I bought tickets and entered Keith & Proctor's Harlem Opera House, 125th street, near Lenox avenue, remarking to my wife that I had "probably bought another bunch of junk." As we entered a brand new Gaumont film was running, and right there the surprise began, for not only, as I said, was the reel a first run, but it was being run at normal speed and the screen showed that its shifting images were projected by a real operator—a man of real knowledge, who knew how to and did make use of his brains. I watched the performance altogether for an hour before I visited the operator, and at no time was there a shadow on the screen. At all times the field was evenly and brilliantly illuminated and the focus sharp. The writer believes he is something of an operator, but he frankly admits he could have done no better himself, except that the speed was just a trifle slow at times. But after watching the racehorse fashion of running pictures in New York City, this seemed a good fault. After making certain that the excellence of the performance was no accident, but the real thing, I hunted up the house manager, Mr. C. J. Holms, who proved affable and courteous to a degree. Incidentally I have noticed that all really good theater managers are good fellows. It goes with the trade. Mr. Holms favored me (his exact words): "I find I cannot get along without the Moving Picture World, and each week go through it just as soon as it arrives." After a pleasant chat, I went up and spoke to Arthur Ritter, the operator, the first and only New York man I have seen put up a strictly first-class, high-class projection performance. Mind you, I don't say, or even intimate, that there are not others; but Mr. Ritter is the only one I have seen, and I have visited a goodly number of shows, too. And now as to the effect of able management, combined with new films and good projection: Mr. C. J. Holms informs me that the Harlem Opera House, with nothing at all but pictures and songs, has successfully competed with nearby houses running half a dozen acts of vaudeville (alleged) and pictures (?). More than this, the "Harlem" has done a much larger business than its combination vaudeville-picture competitors. Last Saturday evening was literally a roaster. It was so hot we all actually suffered, yet the house, which holds 1,400, was comfortably filled. This is the type of house that means the ultimate salvation of the motion picture business. It reminded me strongly of the Orpheum of Chicago, though it is much larger. Also it ran a longer and even better program. The writer is congratulating himself that he lives near the Harlem Opera House. He will be found there quite frequently, for both he and his wife enjoy really good pictures, while the other kind are to him an agony.

IMITATION OR IMAGINARY MOVING PICTURES IN NEWSPAPER ILLUSTRATIONS.

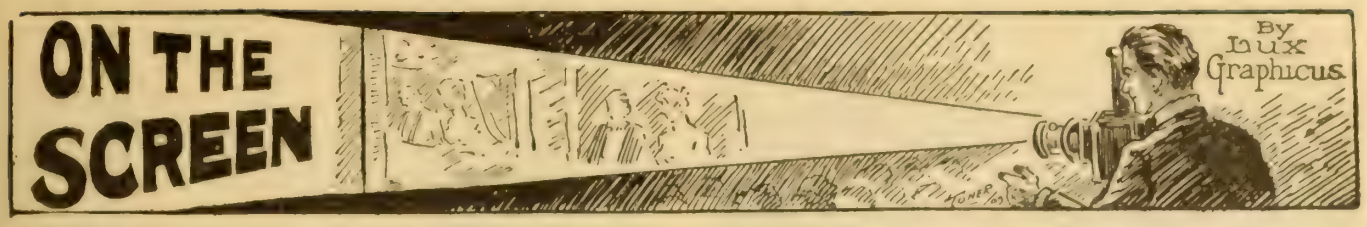
There is a saying that "imitation is the sincerest flattery;" this saying supposes the act of imitation as the flattery, but what about the nature of the imitation? If this be crude it would be best not to imitate at all. These thoughts are suggested by the exceeding crude and uncouth nature of much of the illustration work in many of the newspapers of to-day. Indeed, in many instances the pictures are of a nature unworthy the times in which we live, making the non-illustrated papers superior to many of the illustrated ones. Without doubt there is no dearth of free-hand artists and illustrators; to say nothing of the ever-present photographer. If none of these are available, surely there is no need for the makeshift, or perhaps there is no need for the pictures at all, as bad work is better left out than used to fill up space. Bad work, on worse subjects, is unworthy in twentieth century journalism.

One New York paper especially is given to producing a series of pictures, stretching across two pages, or a full sheet of its issue, supposedly after a moving picture style, recording each succeeding event in the series, which in the majority of instances is a murder; as if the printed record not being enough to satisfy the most morbid curiosity, brutal illustrations are conjured by fertile minded half-rate artists to supplement the horrors of the crime. The imaginary pictures are in themselves abominable, while that which they represent is not only vicious but criminal, and the sight of them debasing. While thus abusing public decency, this very paper prates about "improper moving pictures," moralizes against the "fight pictures," and then proceeds to draw and publish blood-curdling imaginary scenes in a murder. No wise person objects to being told of a "mote" which may blur his vision, but the critic must be a clear-minded, clean-eyed one, and not one with a "beam" in the eye, for hypocrisy is one of the worst of evils. In the varied fields of good in which we believe the moving pictures may be used advantageously we find that of newspaper illustrating must now be added; it will truthfully supplement the reading, preventing an impure imagination, and while perhaps disappointing the morbid readers will please the intelligent and refined.

W. H. JACKSON.

A KALEM WEEK.

Smith & Walker, of the Lyric Theater, Marinette, Wis., have inaugurated a new fad—manufacturers' weeks. The Standard Film Exchange (Chicago), which supplies their service, informs us that a Kalem week was recently run at the Lyric with great success.



"Wish I had a camera with me," said I to my companion, who also looked as if he were similarly affected. For right before my very eyes was a strikingly picturesque group of moving picture actors, unconsciously but splendidly posed on a flight of steps leading into the studios of one of the greatest moving picture manufacturing companies in the world—The Vitagraph Company of America, to-wit. They were a brave-looking group, those actor men. One was a kilted Highlander; another, if I remember aright, an Indian brave; another a sailor; another a nondescript ferocity. Their faces, their necks, their arms were stained with the make-up, and there they stood either waiting to go on or resting after having come off. Behind me was the little lake in which I believe Annette Kellerman was photographed in a Vitagraph production.

It was not the first time that I had been "behind the scenes" of a moving picture making theater, and yet this one had all the elements of novelty. Not even the wisest of us ever loses interest in the unknown, the unseen, the mysterious, the invisible. Behind the scenes at any theater, moving picture making or otherwise, is all this. Every mother's son of us likes to be in at the beginning of things, to see how things are done, how they originate and are originating, and, frankly, though I have been in at the beginning of many moving pictures, I was as much interested as ever the other day in Vitagraph land to see the making of a Vitagraph, as if I had never looked upon a moving picture, as if I had never studied a scenario, witnessed a production, criticised a picture.

I wonder if the millions and millions of people who daily look upon these pictures or any considerable number of them pause to think of the amount of work there is in the making of a picture. When you see the finished product on the screen it all looks so easy, so simple, so natural, does it not? Not one in a hundred stops to think that the picture is the outcome of what Mr. Mantalini calls a "demnition horrid grind." Anglice—hard work. I was once watching a champion billiard match in England. The man in play had rounded up a score of about 1,200, when an old gentleman sitting behind me said to the player: "You play so easily, Mr. ——." "I have been practising for fourteen years," was the quiet rejoinder.

A gushing young lady once said to Tennyson, the poet: "How beautifully smooth that little line of yours in 'Maud' does sound, Mr. Tennyson." "So it should, my dear," was the poet's reply. "It took me six days before I got that line right." These were the reflections that ran through the mind of your "Lux Graphicus," as he stood and watched three of the Vitagraph companies at rehearsal work in the great Flatbush studio recently.

* * *

Have any of my readers ever written a play, and then seen it on the stage? I have. The play as I saw it bore some resemblance to the play as I imagined it and wrote it. I said "bore some resemblance." The producer had had something to say in the matter, and I thank God he had, for my play, as I imagined it and as I wrote it, would have been too funny for words. The speeches were too long, the action—well, there was not any action, the producer put that in, and as for the movements of the characters and the pauses—well, when I wrote that play I thought I knew something about the business. After its production I decided to learn something. So I did.

Producers, then, if those I saw at work in the Vitagraph studio may be regarded as criteria, are necessarily opportunists. Probably the scenario as it leaves the mind of the author is a totally different thing in its realization to the author's conception. You have only to see producers at work to realize that this is so, that it must be so, and why it is so. Your moving picture play has, of course, a main theme for superstructure, but it is built up bit by bit, by producers, actors and actresses.

* * *

Your scene is set; your actors go through their parts; the producer stands script in hand. The producer is the master potter and he moulds the characters in front of him just as if they were lumps of clay; he fashions them into human beings of an improved type. He touches here, he pats there, he presses somewhere else. All through the rehearsal they are, as I have said, just "bits of clay in the hands of the potter." Probably the aptest simile I can employ.

* * *

Watching these rehearsals, one gets a concrete idea of the value of action in a moving picture play in which they are very few pauses. While there is much thought, the characters do not stop to think. It seems to be a necessity of the case that there must be something doing, some movement, going on all the time. The moving picture is a play of action. I can recall many plays, and so no doubt can the reader, in which there have been long dramatic pauses which have held the audience at the tension point. Not so in the moving picture play, where gesture and movement must be rapid and continuous. I speak generally, of course, with reference to the American play. I can recall one or two French Pathe pictures in which facial gesture took the place of bodily movement for many seconds. But these are rare instances. Such subjects appeal to me, but they do not appeal generally to American audiences, who seem, according to my observation, to absolutely desiderate action and movement.

In the Vitagraph studio I saw how it was done. I watched scene after scene gone over again and again, under the charge of patient producers, who never seemed to weary of directing the characters what to do, how to do it, and when to do it. A position would be changed and altered as inspiration suggested. So would the point of view of the camera. The play, as I have said, was built up before one's very eyes on the superstructure of a main theme. It grew, as it were, in the hands of the producer. And everything proceeded smoothly, logically and evenly. No fuss, no shouting, no disorder, everything quietly restrained, in good taste and pleasant to look at.

I should say, then, from what I saw at the Vitagraph studio and have seen elsewhere, that the lot of a stock company of a first-class moving picture making house is preferable to that of the stock company of many great theatrical enterprises. The conditions of the work are more agreeable. It is mostly done in the daytime; there is comparatively little traveling, producers and principals are considerate; the awful ordeal of a public appearance is not to be faced, and there is a touch of the happy family about the whole business. I think at times that I would like to be a moving picture actor. The work looks so nice and agreeable in a well-appointed studio. I should probably miss the applause which so stimulates your actors and actresses on the talking stage. For I like applause. Who does not? This reminds me of a story of a super in the company of the late W. C. Macready who so hungered for a share of the great actor's applause, that one night he could not resist the temptation of rushing before the curtain and making a set speech of melodrama. Holding his hand aloft, he exclaimed in melodramatic style: "The man who would raise his hand against a woman, is not a man." But instead of the expected round of applause he was hissed off—got "the hook" in fact. It is one of the negative advantages of being a moving picture actor that he cannot possibly get the hook. By the way, moving picture heroines are praised and applauded on the screen. Is the villain ever hissed or hooted? I have not heard of such a case yet. Has any reader? Also, does the saleslady's matinee idol figure on the screen?

"MAN ABOUT TOWN" ON THE JEFFRIES-JOHNSON FIGHT.

The greatest pride of the United States of America is its independence. The first seed was planted by the Pilgrims and the sprouts were carefully and jealously guarded until, despite the attacks of the wild, barbarous natives, they finally effected settlements. They were great, hardy people seeking liberty. Plymouth Rock forms one of the center pieces of history. Freedom was what they sought. Religious, political and economic freedom. In those days the women and children walked through the woods and along the highways guarded by armed husbands, brothers and sweethearts, who were always on the alert for the stealthy enemy—the Indian. The old Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island towns bear striking marks of what those good old people did in the name of liberty. There are many old forts and monuments—not to speak of the ancient graves—that speak eloquently in behalf of the appeal for freedom. The Pilgrims sought religious freedom, and they got it.

Then the rebellion of the colonies followed on the pages of history. Have you ever read the Declaration of Independence? If you have not, do so. If you are reserving all rights so far as your native country is concerned you will find it more beneficial than detrimental. I am under the impression at the present time that the tax on tea was one of the chief incidents that set the pot boiling. At that time clergymen were not receiving as high as $20,000 a year in salary. Their pay was extremely moderate and they were keeping closer to the Sermon on the Mount than many clergymen of the present day are.

There was one blot upon the pages. It is best told in Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter." Once under suspicion and you were lost. The fight for religious liberty at times led to fanaticism, even to the extent that many means of torture and death were invoked. This gradually worked a salvation for the suffering of the world, but only by the destruction of the initiative. The branding, the stocks and the burning at the stake gradually gave way. The witchcraft theory ultimately fell to pieces. The gospel power, as it were, gave way to militarism and with the ending of the Independence war the voice of the people became supreme and we finally became possessed of a Constitution that is not to be winked at.

We now arrive at the moving picture period. We find certain people up in arms, ready to crucify a certain class of people who have selected a certain means of investment. No concern is given as to preliminaries, contracts or money involved. No attention is paid to constitutional rights. A boycott is ordered, regardless of the rights of anyone. The one redeeming feature is that many of the people who, at first, were radical in their views, are saying the least.

There was never a time when the general interests of the moving picture business were more at stake than during the period immediately following the Johnson-Jeffries fight at Reno, Nevada. For years and years fights have been reproduced in moving pictures, and it was not until the Reno event that the guardians of the public morals discovered that such pictures were beyond the pale of public policy. The pictures of the Johnson-Burns, Burns-Gunner Moir, Gans and Nelson, Johnson and Ketchel, and many such fights were exhibited throughout the country with no intimation of objection. But in the particular case of the Johnson-Jeffries fight a most antagonistic spirit was displayed.

According to the press reports the Christian Endeavor and kindred societies claim credit for the agitation. Unfortunately the public press is not as closely allied to truthfulness as it is to freedom. The fact is that announcements of barring out the fight pictures were made before any of the religious organizations were alive to the situation, and these organizations are not aware at the present time as to what started the fight on the pictures. To be truthful about the matter, they have made themselves, unwittingly, the catspaw of designing people.

One of the chief arguments advanced is that the exhibition of the pictures will lead to race riots. That is absolute rot. The fight between Jeffries and Johnson took place on a holiday—the Fourth of July—the adherents of both parties were in a most inflammable condition by the time the reports of the fight reached the various towns. Has anyone heard of any riots since that night? In one theater in New York an angered audience made a display because they were given a stereopticon and not a moving picture reproduction of the fight. In another theater the audience became restless because fake pictures were shown, but before the discontent ripened the manager stopped the pictures and made public announcement that he had been deceived.

JUST BEFORE THE BATTLE. NEWSPAPER REPORTERS PHOTOGRAPHING THE TWO CONTESTANTS AND THEIR ATTENDANTS

At this point I wish to say that any person who deliberately palms off bogus goods on a reputable man who is able and willing to pay for the genuine article cannot be too severely dealt with. The manager who stopped the fake pictures is one of the most prominent in the theatrical circles of New York; in fact, he is known throughout the country. He claims he was absolutely deceived and threatens suits for damages. There is one big loophole through which it is quite likely the people who furnished the pictures will crawl; they contracted to furnish a reproduction of the fight. Whether or not the kind of reproduction was specified has not come to light. But regardless of technicalities, the apparent trick cannot escape the condemnation of all interested in the welfare of the business.

One of the New York daily papers published a cartoon in which Uncle Sam was depicted as shielding children from the baneful influence of the fight pictures. Like many others, the artist who drew the cartoon worked upon ignorance. He, like thousands of other people, supposed the pictures were to be spread broadcast among the nickelodeons. Like the majority of people who are not in touch with the moving picture business, he gave the matter neither intelligent consideration or investigation. I have it upon authoritative information that before the first production of the Johnson-Jeffries fight pictures the promoters will have about $250,000 expended upon them. The only way in which this amount can be recovered and a profit netted is to put the pictures out on State rights. By this I mean sell the exclusive right of production in the various States and countries to the highest respective bidders. The result will be that the successful bidders must charge admission prices that are much in excess of the nickelodeon prices. This will mean that the children whom the daily press so sensationally defend, or pretends to, will not see the pictures at all, and the audiences will be composed of people who are competent to discriminate between right and wrong.

During the past week I have been repeatedly questioned as to what I thought the attitude of the New York municipal authorities would be regarding the pictures. I will confess I have no information on the subject further than the declaration of Mayor Gaynor that he cannot see his way clear to issue any order until he sees the pictures. I feel that if we had more Gaynors we would have a better country. The position he takes is a perfectly sane one. He stopped shows on Broadway that he considered against public policy and if he finds the Johnson-Jeffries pictures are of similar character he will no doubt do his duty.

Some say that the danger of race riots should be taken into consideration. The race riot talk is all bosh. Jeffries was not the first white man beaten by a negro. Tommy Burns went around the world with the championship chip on his shoulder and the negro defeated him. The pictures of the fight were exhibited in every civilized country on the globe. Was there any talk of race riots then?

* * *

To put the case bluntly, there is an under-current in this matter that is working upon the simplicity and prejudices of certain people.

* * *

To come nearer the issue, I wish to say that I have been given a legal opinion that a legal contract made in one State of the Union cannot be summarily abrogated by local order. There is an important constitutional question involved.

I want to say one thing more. More than ninety per cent. of the press reports that the fight pictures will be prohibited are fakes. I have it from unqualified authority that representative men desirous of having an interest in the exhibitions have declared in writing that all reports in that direction are false and they will guarantee that the pictures can be produced in their cities without the remotest interference.

I got this information at the eleventh hour and I am confident that it is correct

"A Midnight Cupid" (Biograph).—An interesting love story, with a novelty represented by a wealthy young man playing tramp and going home in response to a letter, working on a farm and falling in love with the farmer's pretty daughter. Complications arise. The young man is sent away. The girl is locked in her room. But that doesn't do any good and an elopement follows. One of the most delicious scenes in a long time is where the girl and her father realize what she has done in marrying the supposed tramp. It is a picture which amuses, and holds the interest throughout without resorting to unwelcome and perhaps depressing scenes.

"Ferdie's Vacation" (Lubin).—Sometimes a joke recoils on the one who plays it, but in this instance the boss was not so relentless as some and Ferdie was forgiven. The sick sister's subterfuge led to some lively complications when the boss appeared, but in the end everything ends happily and Ferdie is forgiven. The only thing one can complain about in this picture is the fact that the vacation end of it makes one want to join the throng and go along too. The picture is much too realistic for one's peace of mind these hot days.

"The Red Man's Way" (Selig).—Venegance is mine, said one of old. This film tells how a red man wreaked a unique vengeance for the ruin of his home. Strongly dramatic, this film will appeal to those who like good acting and are interested in clever character studies. But there is a thread of sorrow running through it which makes it somewhat mournful in its influences and causes one to sympathize strongly with the Indian whose wife was led astray.

"The Little Preacher" (Melies).—A pleasant Western tale, purporting to relate how a pretty woman preacher succeeded in inducing all the cowboys to leave the saloon and accept prayer books in church as a substitute for whiskey. A neat touch is the picture of the spider weaving his web across the closed door of the saloon. The story is full of action and holds the interest from beginning to end, and more than once raises a laugh when some particularly comical situation develops. The film has all the lively quality required to make it popular.

"A Wireless Romance" (Edison).—A strong dramatic picture, with many beautiful scenes made in Cuba. A novelty is a compelte wireless outfit in actual operation, affording ample opportunity to see how messages are sent and how they are received. A charming love story runs through it all, with a happy ending that pleases everyone who sees it. The story includes many interesting scenes, and the novelty of the wireless outfit adds materially to the peculiar attractiveness. The drama is not weakened because of the novelty, and the acting is sympathetic and in harmony with the subject.

"Big Hearted Mary" (Pathe).—A simple story of childish generosity which is interesting because it represents the impulses of a little girl who wants to befriend her playmate when her father is out of work. All children's stories touch the heart. Something about them appeals with irresistible force to everyone, and this one is no exception to the rule. The photography and action are alike satisfactory.

"Col. Roosevelt Reviewing the French Troops" (Pathe).—A topical picture, short, it is true, but possessing great interest at the present moment. Anything pertaining to the ex-President is popular and attracts much attention. This is no exception to the rule. The figures are clear, but are a bit too close to the camera for the most pleasing pictorial work.

"Attacked by the Arapahoes" (Kalem).—An addition to Kalem's Indian series, introducing another type of redskin. This one is said to be the worst of them all and the scenes reproduced go far to prove that assertion. The picture represents scenes along the old Santa Fe trail, and the gold seekers who camp along the trail are fiercely attacked by the Indians. There is a capture of a mother and son, the escape of the son, who informs the military officer. A chase and a hot battle follow, with the defeat of the Indians and the reunion of the broken family as a climax. The battle scene is probable the best the Kalem people have shown, and one of the best that ever appeared on a screen. It is much too realistic for comfort in some instances. But the pleasure of seeing the separated family reunited makes one forget many of the disagreeable incidents of the battle.

"Between Love and Honor" (Vitagraph).—A strongly dramatic picture, somewhat unpleasant because it depicts with startling clarity the elemental brute passion which sometimes controls man. Brutally treating everyone with whom he comes in contact, justice is surely represented in the insanity and death from exposure of the girl's father. It is more satisfactory, too, that the lover is made to return to life and that a wedding follows. And then the fulfillment of the bliss of marriage, the little one in the house. Out of disheartening beginnings can come, as in this instance, the most beautiful things in life and love.

"The Invincible Sword" (Gaumont).—A dramatic story of unusual interest, powerfully told. The principal events, like the duel, are exciting and rouse the interest of the audience to the highest pitch. The love story running through the film supplies the necessary heart interest, developing a desire to see the lovers come into their own as the story proceeds. The fact that this knight's sword was invincible so long as his heart was free is a novelty in films of this type. Usually it is the other way, and the change furnishes another point of interest. Finely and sympathetically acted, superbly staged and clearly photographed, this picture is certain to be popular.

"Ruins of Medieval Fortifications in France" (Gaumont).—An excellent picture of Aigues-Mortes, the town from which King Louis of France opened the Crusades. The ramparts of the old city, with the river threading through it are shown, and it closes with a beautiful sunset. The Gaumonts have offered numerous excellent sunset views before, of a different character, but none better than this. It is a scenic which deserves to rank with the best that have gone before.

"The Champion of the Race" (Pathe).—An automobile race picture of merit, with a love story running through it, involving a girl, a soldier lover, a rich suitor favored by the father and other complications which usually beset Cupid's devious pathway. However, the girl is equal to the emergency, and by setting her objecting father and suitor adrift in a boat and winning an automobile race in which her father was interested as a contestant, she wins his consent to marry her soldier lover. There is a dash and spirit to this picture that makes one wake up when it is shown and the audience applauds the girl winner, even as the crowd at the track applauded her. The episode of the boat hook and the badly soaked James is mildly amusing, even though it suggests such a gruesome thing as drowning.

"What the Daisy Said" (Biograph).—A love story which might have resulted disastrously, but fortunately did not. The first scene, where the girls are telling fortunes with the daisy petals, is suggestive of rustic happiness of years ago. Enter the gypsy, and his influence, by which he makes the two sisters rivals. Next come chagrin and disappointment, the striking down of the girl's father, and the ignominious hiding of the romantic gypsy in a barrel of plebeian potatoes. Well, he is run out of the neighborhood, and the girls return happily to their former sweethearts. There is a simplicity and directness about this picture which greatly increases its interest, and the effect upon one is pleasant. It brings back old days, and youthful pleasures and visions, more freely, perhaps, than almost any picture of recent date. The acting is sympathetic and clear photography adds to the general effect.

"The Highbinders" (Lubin).—A story of Chinatown, any Chinatown, in which Chinese mission work, a pretty teacher and some agents of the Tongs figure prominently. It is dramatic because all scenes of that character are dramatic, and this might well be a transcript from actual life. One is given a close view of the way the Tongs operate and the frustrated attempt to kill a rich merchant, and later the young minister, are representations of actual scenes in this misunderstood world. The picture is convincing and one feels that an intimate view of actual occurrences in Chinatown has been afforded.

"The Almighty Dollar" (Lubin).—A bit of live comedy caused by a man soldering a tack to a silver dollar and driving the tack into a chair. The fun begins when man after man attempts to make way with the dollar, and then joins the crowd to wait for the next victim. Finally a man walks away with the chair, gets the dollar and a hat and coat thrown in. The chase before he escapes by a disguise affords some extremely funny situations.

"Just for Good Luck" (Pathe).—A comedy based upon the old superstition that a hunchback is lucky. In this instance a girl who breaks crockery suddenly ceases when she is married to a hunchback, but when he is straightened, consternation resides in the household. By the time he gets home it is about necessary to purchase a fresh supply. But he compromises by inducing his mother-in-law to assume the position of official hunchback, and his wife's propensity to smash things ceases again.

"The Faithless Lover" (Pathe).—A love story laid in the picturesque town of old Grenada. It has a disagreeable ending. The lover proves faithless and the disappointed girl's father shoots him in revenge.

"The Hallroom Boys" (Selig).—An important addition to the moving picture stage is first seen in this film, with Fred Walton, one of the best known exponents of the silent drama in both America and Europe. It is a comedy coup which will redound to the credit of the Selig Company, and will set a new mark for comedy of this character. Those who have enjoyed the Hallroom Boys heretofore will enjoy them still more here. They will learn much that is new in the presentation of a superior variety of comedy.

"Out of the Night" (Edison).—Emotions to which some may be a stranger will be aroused by this picture. The night of blindness is meant, and it reproduces the love story of a man who is gradually losing his sight, yet so cleverly conceals it from his sweetheart that she never knows it until she learns it by accident. Love is a marvelous passion, overmastering in its manifestations, and where it is true even the night of blindness cannot shut it out. The story is told with so much sympathy by the actors that one seems almost to pass through the scenes represented on the screen and become, for the time, one of the sufferers in this love drama. It is a film, the memory of which will remain long, and the impression it makes cannot be lost in a day.

"A Hidden Serpent" (Gaumont).—A Hindoo story in which a servant is represented as placing a poisonous serpent where it will bite his master so that he can obtain the master's wife. His success is short lived. The wife shortly shoots him dead. One may not commend this picture because of the character of the story. It is neither amusing nor informing, consequently misses two very important features in motion picture making.

"In the Realm of the Czar" (Gaumont).—A series of excellent illustrations of striking scenes in Moscow, showing the principal points of interest throughout the city. The film is to be commended for the excellent judgment displayed by the operator in the selection of his view points and for the technical skill utilized in producing the pictures. Like all of the scenic work from the Gaumont studio, this affords an excellent substitute for an actual visit to the places illustrated and as such deserves all the praise that may be accorded it.

"Nellie's Farm" (Vitagraph).—An illustration of what the fresh air fund does for the unfortunate tenement children. The change of environment is beneficial for Dick, but one's sympathies are strongly aroused by Nellie's helplessness, which prevents her going. However, the generosity of Dick and his endeavor to carry back some of the country to the bedridden cripple partially compensates for the fact that she can't go, too.

INDEPENDENT.

"One Man's Confession" (Centaur).—Whether it is well to reproduce the supposed life of a man as this one is reproduced, making it a virtual confession is, perhaps, a nice question; but the probability is that few would care that their own lives were to be reproduced in this way. Of course this is all a matter of taste, but considered from the standpoint of the average man, one confession like this is sufficient.

"Aviation at Montreal" (Centaur).—A good picture of the scenes at Montreal during a recent aviation contest. The photography is good and the operator selected his view points with intelligence.

"Jimmy" (Sales Co.).—An episode based upon frontier scenes which might be true. More than one woman was taken by the Indians in this same way. Not many ever returned as this one did, and not many second wives would retire in favor of the first if she did return. As an illustration of one of the dangers of frontier life this picture is interesting. Wether one likes it or not one must recognize its power, and acknowledge that the producer has touched upon a theme of heart interest.

"The Call of the Circus" (Imp).—The call of the circus may be strong, but the call of love is stronger and when the minister insists that the circus girl go with him because he loves her she cannot refuse. It is a simple little story, yet it touches the heart, and therefore interests every audience that sees it.

"The Sheriff of Black Gulch" (Bison).—A Western story in which gambling and intrigue form considerable features. But at the last interest centers in a card game in which a woman plays with the sheriff for her lover's life and wins. Aside from these features the picture is not particularly interesting. Indeed, this house has put out many heretofore which were better, and more clearly reproduced the phases of life in that interesting section.

"The Girl Who Dared" (Defender).—A drama of interest repressing what happened to a girl who dared to do. It has all the qualities which have made previous releases popular and will not fail to attract favorable attention.

"From Gypsy Hands" (Kinograph).—A boy scout picture certain to make a hit because it develops some thrilling features as it proceeds. The boy scout is the acme of cleverness in his department, and his work is so pleasing that the audience feels like congratulating him upon his success.

"A New Hat for Nothing" (Kinograph).—A comic which may offer some ideas of a method by which a new hat could be obtained. At any rate, this picture will while away a few minutes very pleasantly and will cause the audience to laugh vigorously, a most commendable characteristic of any film.

"The Money Lender's Son" (Lux).—A love story, which includes an unnecessary ejectment of a mother and her daughter by a heartless money lender, and the assistance rendered by his son who had been injured by highwaymen. Forgiveness and a wedding follow in due course.

"Must Be Without Encumbrance" (Lux).—An amusing picture of the difficulties which beset a couple who were turned out because they had children and had trouble in finding a house for the same reason. They put the little chaps in bandboxes, but an accident disclosed their presence. The indignant landlord chases the unfortunate family upstairs and then compels them to find a new home.

"The Girl Strike Leader" (Thanhouser).—One of those pictures which thrill one despite their improbability. It may go in stories, but never in fact, that an owner of a factory marries one of his girl employees, and a strike leader at that; but even though that is true, one cannot but feel a thrill of pleasure to see this dramatic story work out to its conclusion. Of dime novel order, melodramatic and all the rest, it is interesting because it represents the final triumph of sturdy human qualities.

"The Burglar and the Baby" (Powers).—Once again a baby, this time a sick one, is shown as softening a criminal's heart and causing him to desist from his burglarious intentions. Yet, when the burglar discovers it is his old sweetheart's baby more contrition follows, this time of a more practical nature, and he replaces the silver he had stolen. If these pictures are true to life a baby is a profitable asset when burglars are about.

"A Mightier Hand" (Powers).—Often the writer of these criticisms has called attention to the undesirability of making films of this character. Sometimes murders are necessary to the artistic development of a plot, but the carrying out of a definitely announced purpose to kill is scarcely the correct thing to show in a picture supposed to amuse or instruct. That a convenient attack of heart failure prevents the half-crazed woman from fulfilling her threat does not alter the real situation. The man falls dead at her feet, the result of fright at her appearance and declared intention to shoot him. The last scene over the man's dead body is pathetic, and forms a rather disagreeable background for the young people to utilize as their start in life. The chance meeting of the young people, the elopement, and other features are interesting, but reconciliation rather than virtual murder would be quite as impressive and would leave a better feeling. It is quite likely that the idea of just retribution was in the producer's mind, but it results in such a gruesome ending that it should either be changed or the film withdrawn. The quality of the Powers pictures is so uniformly good that it seems all the more regrettable that the output is marred by this mistake.

"John, the Usher" (Eclair).—A love story which has a dramatic, though bitter, ending. Long years after being forcibly separated from his sweetheart, a man, now a vagabond, falls dead at her feet, clasping in his hands her portrait, which he had cherished all the long years. It is suggestive, and being acted with intelligence it arouses a flood of powerful, though rather unpleasant emotions.

"Old Heads and Young Hearts" (Imp).—They spoiled a desired wedding by favoring it. Then they apparently got into a fight while objecting. The children, just to be contrary, run away and marry. Then their fathers go out and celebrate. Lots of human nature in this film, more, perhaps, than really shows at first glance. Neither is it without its lessons. Perhaps old heads will be able to figure out these lessons for themselves.

"The Call of the West" (Nestor).—A strong film, presenting this subject in a very graphic and convincing style. It is quite in keeping with the excellent films this house has brought out dealing with the West and will rouse and hold the interest of the audience.

"The Pirate's Dower" (Yankee).—A melodramatic story, replete with action and incident, in which a pirate's ill-gotten wealth is made the dower of a worthy young woman, enabling her to contract a satisfactory marriage. Like all stories dealing with pirates it is romantic, and the romance and love story supply abundant heart interest to satisfy the most exacting devotee of such stories.

"A Mexican Love Affair" (Bison).—An exhibition of unreasonable jealousy that almost costs a life. It is startling when one girl pushes the other over the cliff into the water, and there is some suspense when the rescuer and rescued are struggling with the waves. But speedily all is made right and the fete is resumed in a general hilarious tumult.

"The Wonderful Cigar" (Great Northern).—A lively comedy which represents what happens when a man undertakes to smoke a wonderful cigar. It will keep your audience good natured from beginning to end.

"The Laughing Machine" (Great Northern).—A laugh from beginning to end. It is clean comedy, lively and fun provoking without being disagreeable. Such comedies increase the attractiveness of a program and do not seem incongruous after seeing a more serious film.

"The Tamer: Alfred Schneider and His Lions" (Ambrosio).—A picture illustrating what a tamer can do with lions. Some of the acts are astonishing and illustrate the marvelous control a man can exercise over even the king of beasts, even the lion, the ruler of them all.

A NOVEL COMPETITION.

What's in a name? Shakespeare tells us that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. True, but no other name would sound so well. There is much virtue in euphony. All of us like our best girls to have nice sounding names. For example: Ask any man whether he prefers to have his girl's name Edith instead of Abigail, and you bet he would declare for Edith. The Essanay Company have discovered a fact patent to many, namely, that the words "moving picture show," or "five-cent theater," do not do the beautiful entertainment justice in the way of nomenclature. So they are inviting competitors to submit a word which will lucidly describe the entertainment given in a moving picture house. For this they are offering the sum of $100, as per the appended particulars.

The proposition which is offered is explained in a few lines in an article in the Essanay Guide of August 1, to-wit: "We believe the 'moving picture show' or 'five-cent theater,' as it is commonly labeled, is rapidly outgrowing these rather limited appellations. We are, therefore, soliciting a one-word name, descriptive of the entertainment offered by the best class of theaters showing high class moving pictures, illustrated songs, with also a good musical program." The Essanay Company's contest is open immediately and will be concluded at noon, September 1, and is open to all exhibitors and picture fans. Prominent film men will be chosen to act as judges and the prize of $100 will be awarded the contributor of the most appropriate word, as soon as the judges in the contest can have time to pass judgment. The Essanay Company are depending upon the inventive ingenuity of the contributors in coining an appropriate word and have offered a number of helpful suggestions in their twice-monthly bulletin, the Essanay Guide. The word will probably be an invention derived from the various terms, animated, moving or motion pictures, illustrated songs and music. The terms of the contest are these: One hundred dollars are offered for a new one-word name for moving picture shows. The contest is open immediately to all who desire to contribute a word or any number of different words. The word or words should be typewritten, or written plainly in ink on the face of an envelope, while the name and address of the contributor of the word should be written on a separate slip and sealed within the envelope. As the envelopes are received they will be time-stamped, so that in case there is more than one contribution of the prize-winning name the envelope which is received first will contain the name of the winner of the $100. The judges in the contest, whose names will be announced later, will be men of acknowledged authority in moving picture affairs. The contest opens immediately and will be concluded at noon, September 1, and the name of the prize-winner will be announced as soon after as is consistent. Contributors should address their contributions to the Contest Editor, Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, 435 North Clark street, Chicago, Ill.

There should be an interesting contest and the successful inventor of the word, whatever it is, will not only earn the Essanay reward, but the thanks of the community at large, as much confusion of idea prevails as to the best way in which to briefly describe a moving picture entertainment.

ON THE BIG FIGHT.

The big fight is over and left in its trail a lot of soreheads. In this great army of soreheads we not only find persons who lost their money on Jeffries, but we find a number of other men who failed to secure the coveted privilege of taking the fight pictures and are now doing their best to prohibit their exhibition.

The pugilistic fight is over, but it gave birth to another fight—a race color fight. Who is to blame? The enemies of cinematography and the petty jealousy existing amongst moving picture manufacturers. If the motion pictures had been left out of the game there would be no fuss and Johnson would be allowed to go on his theatrical tour unmolested and there would be no talk of these race color riots.

The negro in general is ignorant, but, let me tell you, the idiotic newspapers, ministers and dissatisfied moving picture manufacturers, who are stirring up this affair, show far more ignorance than the lowest colored man and are enemies to any decent government. Yes, we have more ignorant white men; at least, if the negro is ignorant, he is innocently ignorant, while the white is ignorant by choice.

If the negroes, justly proud of what Johnson did, were getting ready to lionize their hero, we have nothing to show that the negro population took advantage of the present situation to down the whites, and, if we want to be just and fair, we must say that all the riots recorded since the big fight have been incited by the white man.

If the authorities fear riots, the authorities should have used a little common-sense ahead of time. The authorities should have known that the chances were in favor of the colored champion and it should have been their duty to prevent the fight, so as to remove any possible chance of riots. The authorities acted a good deal like the farmer who closes his stable door after the horse is gone.

What will be the consequences of this bitter opposition? The same old story, repeated for years and years; the old story of the Eden Garden—the forbidden fruit. More opposition you will make to the fight pictures, more you will advertise them, and as folks will want to see them, they will see them at any cost. The authorities have tried in vain to stop gambling, and for every house they close, we see two new ones. It will be the fate of the fight pictures, if disbarred from the public theaters, they will be shown in other places, in cellars, in out-of-town barns, and perhaps some enterprising men will hire barges and show the fight pictures way out on the ocean, or on our lakes and rivers. The pictures will be shown, and perhaps to larger audiences than if allowed in our regular theaters.

What will the dissatisfied moving picture interests gain by helping the common enemy? Will you gain the satisfaction of hurting the interests of the other side? Perhaps; but if you cause the ruin of the other side, you will cause your own ruin and put yourselves out of business.

What we need are brainy men to work and to produce good pictures. We have no use for these spiteful fellows, using all their energy to down others. All these foolish talks are out of place. Why accuse other men of a supposed crime when you can be accused of a similar offense? Go to work, forget the fight pictures, be good sports; you failed to secure the rights like Jeffries failed to win the fight; try to produce something better; get the patronage of the public, of the exhibitor and of the renter by giving them high-class work. The public of to-day has some common-sense; they do not want to listen to the yarns, pay no attention to petty jealousy, but want good pictures and will patronize places showing such pictures.

Cinematography has some powerful enemies in the newspapers, and ministers, and it should be the common duty of all factions to produce such a high-class work as to put to silence the common enemy. J. M. B.

On another page will be seen an advertisement of the Joslyn Company, a concern that came into being in a night and boasts of having done business before they opened up. According to their letterhead there is nothing connected with the business which they are not prepared for. They are doing a rental business and supplying good service—so says one of their customers who let us know of the firm's existence. But write to them and if you don't see what you want on that letterhead, then it is because it reads like Ferad's bill-of-fare.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Over at the Orpheum Theater, last week, accompanying the song entitled "Gee, But It's Great to Be in Love," sung by Mr. Walter Wilson, were projected on the screen a set of beautifully colored and photographically perfect slides made by the Genre Transparency Company, of Chicago.

It is pleasing to note the rapidity with which the picture show is taking the place of the old-time fake concessions at the Summer parks. At White City there was tried out the "Trip to the North Pole," which failed completely to satisfy the many patrons. Following this failure and entering the building that had already received a black eye, came a picture show, exhibiting practically new films from Selig, Essanay, and numerous other licensed manufacturers. The interior of the building is appropriately decorated, and although not expensively so, suits its purpose. It was on a week day that this concession was visited, when the thermometer registered somewhere in the neighborhood of 94 degrees, thus being unfavorable in every possible way for good business. This fact did not seem to keep out the people, who were overanxious to witness the performance. That wonderful fire picture of Selig's was the feature on that night and the audience seemed more than enthused by its purport. The projection was satisfying enough, and every hot-weather comfort was provided for by the management. Which is the better, the old near-fake concession in our parks, or the good, clean projection of wholesome subjects? Judging from the approval of the public, the picture show stands without comparison, and with its innovation the Summer parks should once more regain their supremacy among the American millions to-day.

Racine, Wis., has been talked of once before by our Mr. Bradlet, at which time the existant conditions were not altogether favorable for the picture show. It cannot be said now, however, that the conditions are any more favorable, but the interest of the populace in motion pictures is rapidly growing. Why not the picture show? The main street at night is thronged with strollers, who would feel justified in spending a few minutes and the price of admission in order to see a good picture show, well presented.

The Racine Opera House, which is the only first-class theater for the larger road shows, has gone over to pictures for the Summer months at five cents admission. The Bijou Theater, Wigley Hall and two nickelodeons comprise Racine's amusement area. The Bijou and the Wigley devote most of the entertainment to vaudeville, with about three reels of films, while the nickelodeons are practically nothing more than store shows, poorly ventilated and anything but neat in appearance.

This all goes to show that Racine will appreciate the motion picture when it is exhibited in a proper place. The town offers many advantages, it being a great manufacturing center and extremely wealthy and thickly populated.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

The cry regarding the restriction or barring of the Jeffries-Johnson fight in the moving picture houses that has gone up all over the country, has been felt in the National Capital. Here the City Commissioners placed a ban upon such an exhibit, believing that it might make disturbances, owing to the large colored population of Washington.

There has been a strong claim that the Commissioners have no legal authority to prohibit the presentation of the Jeffries-Johnson fight, but these officers show that they have this right and have made a firm stand against such an exhibition.

From the accounts in the local newspapers, one might judge that the managers of the motion picture theaters—and there are more than half a hundred here—had risen almost en masse in protest of such an order. A personal visit among the most representative houses proved the contrary: the managers have no desire to rebel at all. While expressing the belief that the order was without legal authority, they have accepted the stand of the Commissioners and the public, which is also against the showing of the films, and will abide by the ruling.

One of the managers (who controls several of our first theaters) said: "We are here to please the public, not to seek its censure or disapproval. There is strong sentiment against the pictures and that is sufficient reason for us to omit them from our screens."

When questioned whether the barring of these pictures would cause any loss of money to the theaters, the reply was: "Merely prospective large door receipts, that's all." But the general opinion is that this was too speculative to be tangible and the receipts might not be greater than the usual daily runs. Certainly they would not be sufficient to lose the good-will of the public in making the test.

The storm of protest which the papers have reported appears to be more apprehensive than real and the matter has about blown over.

Even the exchange for Washington and vicinity is not excited over the ruling and has made no complaint. When asked if the movement of the public and officials here would result in any monetary loss, the reply was, "Not in the least. We have not been advised as to the disposition of the film and do not know whether it would come to the shows through the exchange or from the company direct."

A new pamphlet has just made its initial bow before the moving picture public of Washington, under the name of "The National Motion Picture Magazine." The cover design of No. 1, Vol. I., is very attractive, suggestive of the enlightenment furnished by the moving pictures. The contents of the magazine tell briefly the stories of the plays being presented during the week at the Cosmus, Pickwick, Colonial, and Palace theaters. This affords the patrons the opportunity of better understanding the pictures as they are presented and where they will be exhibited. A little assistance like this often adds much to the enjoyment of a performance. Manager A. Julian Brylaski is to be congratulated on this enterprise, and it shows just how progressive a man he is. The booklet found favor from the very first day and will continue to do so each succeeding week.

An interview with Mr. Marcus Notes, of the Empress Theater, as to the class of plays that cater to the public, gave a few side lights on this subject that will interest our readers. The Empress is one of the leading moving picture houses of the Capital City and its patrons are among the first. Mr. Notes plainly demonstrated that he needs no official censor for his films—as is the case with the Washington houses generally—for he does this himself in a more exacting manner than the police. "It was only to-day," he said, "that I discarded a new film, 'The Confessions of a Man,' because of its unhealthy suggestions, and this before it had made a second round. Another moving picture was cut for the one screened sentence, 'Her husband went to the bad.'

"I am sorry to see," went on Mr. Notes, "that an inferior class of plays is creeping into the stock of the exchanges, who seem to have the false idea of profit in handling them, or they may be influenced by other motives. These are not pleasing to the patrons of the best moving picture shows, nor do the managers desire them. The sooner the film companies realize this situation, the better it will be for all concerned.

"I sometimes find fault with the exchange for the kind of reels served as well as for the newness of these. I mean to have the best for my patrons if I have to buy the films myself, and I do not propose to pay for or exhibit 'junk.' I am sure other managers are making the same stand, so the exchanges will have to look to their laurels or they will find a falling off in their patronage.

"There are few amusements that appeal more readily to the general public than the moving pictures, but it is an impressionable amusement and one which invites children. For this reason it is the aim of all first-class managers to present films that will leave pleasant thoughts in the minds of the patrons, or those that are educational."

In conclusion, Manager Notes said: "The managers do not have to take whatever the manufacturers make, regardless of the quality. We have opinions of our own and we patronize only the best and discard the inferior. There are plenty of good plays, by good companies, on the market, and these are the ones that are bringing the crowds and making the success."

LANTERN SLIDES OF THE FIGHT.

Joseph Levi & Co., of 24 Union Square, New York City, have been enterprising enough to secure a set of lantern slides illustrative of the Jeffries-Johnson contest. The series numbers twelve, and it depicts the salient parts of the very much debated Reno fight. On each slide is a brief description making clear the particular stage of the contest illustrated. As interest in this "fight" comparatively continues unabated, we have no doubt a large number of our exhibiting readers will desire to secure a set of the Levi slides. The set can be obtained at $6.00 and should prove a good investment and drawing card for this season of the year, when the moving picture house is in need of all possible attractions for securing the attendance of the public.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Duly Warned.—Mr. A. M. Young, Operator B. O. H. (presumably Belfast Opera House), Belfast, Me., consumes one whole postal card in a friendly endeavor to warn the Editor as follows: "Mr. F. H. R.—I don't see what good it does you to look up poor picture shows and then knock the house and operator and the manager in the Moving Picture World. Some time some of these sixteen-year-old kids you tell about so much will be poking you in the slats if you ain't careful. What do you care how poor a picture show is as long as it costs you nothing?"

On reading the above we immediately considered the purchase of a suit of armor to protect our "slats." Also we thought of retiring to a burglar-proof vault; but to date we are still "considering" these things and haven't acted. I publish the brilliant literary effort of Belfast for the reason that in this terrifically hot weather a good laugh will not come amiss to our readers. Seriously, however, it matters to me, and to every other man who has the ultimate good of the motion picture business at heart, whether a house puts on a good show or a poor one. Poor performance by an operator, whether it be his individual fault, or the fault of poor equipment or film, is a knock at the business as a whole. Anything which is calculated to injure the business as a whole is my business and your business and everyone's else business who is connected with the moving picture form of amusement. To the best of my knowledge, I have said nothing about "sixteen-year-old kids," but since Belfast mentions it I will say that did I have my way one of the requirements to securing a license as an operator would be that the applicant be burdened and bowed down by not less than twenty Summers and an equal number of Winters. I do trust, however, that no sixteen-year-old kid will be so inconsiderate as to poke my slats, for I am very ticklish, and I really don't think I could stand still and let him poke for any length of time.

Several Troubles.—Bloomfield, Iowa, writes: "Am using a Power's No. 5. My picture will not stay in frame. Keeps going down past the aperture plate. Lower intermittent sprocket will not catch it. Sprocket is a new one, and have also gotten new bushings, star and cam. Have set lower intermittent sprocket out as far as possible, in fact, every way I can, and yet it will not stay in frame. Also when framing carriage is about three-quarters of an inch from the top the machine grinds something awful, though when it is raised or lowered it runs smooth as can be."

I take it, friend Bloomfield, that your frame-up lever keeps working up as the machine runs. At the left, just below and behind the take-up sprocket driving gear, passing through a casting and forming the fulcrum of the frame-up lever, you will see a small bolt with a wing thumbscrew. Tighten this thumbscrew with a pair of pliers until the frame-up lever works reasonably hard. If the bolt turns as you turn the thumbscrew, hold it with a screwdriver, as its head is slotted for that purpose. If the wings of the thumbscrew (it really is a "wing-nut," that is its correct name) won't pass the gear wheel when you turn it, remove the gear by loosening set screw in sprocket and slipping off. Take wing-nut off and file wings off until they will pass. As to the lower loop: set your take-up sprocket in line with the intermittent. To do this, use an old corset steel for a straightedge (trying it on a carpenter's square to be sure it is true). Lay the steel against the inside edge of the aperture plate tracks and let it extend down past the take-up sprocket. Set the sprocket so that the teeth on either side will be equi-distant from the straightedge as you lay it against the two aperture plate tracks. Now set your stripper plate by loosening the screws that hold it and moving one edge in or out until the loop sets square with the sprocket. Next, with the set screw provided, raise the take-up sprocket idler away from the sprocket by twice the thickness of a film and keep it that way. Having faithfully carried out these instructions, you should have no further trouble with your loop. The "stripper plate" is the small metal piece at the bottom of the apron which passes up between the sides of the intermittent sprocket. Now as to the grind: The coupling bar of the toggle-joint on left of machine is worn out. This throws the gears out of proper relation to each other at a certain point in the travel of the frame-up carriage. Your machine is evidently quite old and should be, I think, sent to the factory for a thorough overhauling. Too many managers buy a machine and expect it to last almost indefinitely by purchasing a new star, cam or sprocket occasionally. This won't do at all. No matter whether your machine be an Edison, Power's, Pathe, Motiograph, Lubin or any other make, it should be sent to the factory at least once a year for a thorough overhauling. Many theater managers and owners will run a machine until it is almost ready to fall to pieces and finally send it to the factory with orders to do about half the work necessary. They yell bloody murder, arson and police if anything more is done, too, usually refusing point blank to pay for it. Such a course is foolish. It is false economy. There are certain repairs that may be made in the operating room, but certain other ones must be made at the factory, and it is sheer foolishness to run a machine that is in need of repairs, for it can't and won't give you the best results. Mind you, Bloomfield, I am not aiming this either at you or your manager, but just taking the opportunity to say a few words to all operators and managers, since the matter is of more than passing importance. I might add that you must only have take-up tension barely tight enough to take up all the film. Too tight a take-up tension tends to pull out the lower loop.

The Handbook.—New Orleans, La., writes: "I take it you are the same Mr. Richardson who wrote the little Operators' Handbook issued about three years ago. If so, there are many operators and managers (I am one of the latter) here in New Orleans who would like to personally thank you for the aid that little book has been to them. Also I want to ask you if you intend to get out a larger work, and if not, why not? I am sure you could cover the entire field, and such a work would surely repay you, besides helping thousands of those who need such a book. Will you please answer the following in the Operators' Column: What is the difference between a choke coil and a low-voltage transformer such as the Power's Inductor, Hallberg Economizer, the Compensarc, etc.?"

As to the little handbook: The writer has received hundreds of letters similar to yours, New Orleans. The copy for a work such as you suggest is ready and the matter is in type. The Moving Picture World will get it out soon. The difference between a choke coil and a transformer lies in the fact that whereas in the former the amperage is choked back by being compelled to pass through a strong magnetic field set up by winding the wire round an iron core, the metallic contact being continuous, there is absolutely no metallic contact at all between the primary (high voltage) side and the secondary (lamp) circuit in the latter, the secondary circuit being an induced current owing its existence to the fact that an electric current is induced in any conducting circuit passing through a magnetic field, controlled by another circuit, at the instant the current in the primary circuit starts or stops. Alternating, 60-cycle, starts and stops 120 times a second, therefore the secondary circuit current is continuous, but on direct current there would be no effect at all except at the instant the switch was opened or closed.

Best Pictures.—Mr. A. G. Skidmore, Operator, Imperial Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., writes in part as follows: "This house has the reputation of showing the best projected pictures in Bridgeport, and, so far as I have observed, in this part of the country. Traveling men have repeatedly told us they have seen nothing to compare to our pictures. Surely there must be a reason when out of fifteen picture shows ours is the only one with a ten-cent admission, with fifteen cents in the balcony. If you are ever in Bridgeport, just drop into the Imperial and see for yourself."

Now the above might seem like boasting to some, but it does not to me. I like to get letters from men who are proud of the excellence of their performance, provided they can produce some measure of proof that their performance does excel. As neighbor Skidmore says, there certainly is a reason when one house charges twice and thrice the admission its competitors do and gets away with it. This might be partly accounted for in newer films and more of them, but it is but fair to assume that excellence of projection is there also, the more so from the fact that two films properly projected make a better program than do four poorly projected. Most certainly I shall accept your kind invitation whenever I am in your city, friend Skidmore. Meanwhile, can't you send in a letter once in a while setting forth conditions in and about Bridgeport?

A Series Connection.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Am using 45 amperes, 110-volt D. C. on my motion picture. Have but the one machine and run song slides with usual stereo attachment, but find the fierce heat from 45 amperes breaks many slides, particularly the title and chorus slides. Can you tell me some way to avoid this? The lookout hole in my operating room is only six inches square. I have tried to convince the manager that it is too small. He says ask you and he will make it any size you say. Won't you please help me out in this? Am using a five-cell Chicago stage lighting rheostat and have four of the cells in multiple, one idle."

Your amperage proposition is simple. On the wall in some convenient location install a single-pole, single-throw, inclosed knife-switch capable of carrying fifty or sixty amperes. Now attach your rheostat multiple to the lamp through this switch. In other words, this switch is to come in the line between the rheostat and lamp and be placed on the wall where you can reach it handily from operating position. Now with another wire attach one side of that idle rheostat cell to the wire leading from the multiple connection to the switch above described. With still another wire attach the remaining side of the single cell to the wire connecting the switch and the lamp. Solder the wire joints and the job is done. Now when the switch is closed your multiple will work exactly as it works now and you will get the 45 amperes; but when you get ready to run slides you shove the lamp house over and pull the switch above described. This throws the single cell into series with the multiple and the result will be that you will only get the capacity of that one cell, viz., 18 amperes, until you again close the switch, when you will once more get the 45 amperes. Eighteen amperes is quite enough for the stereo. As to the lookout hole, it is nothing short of an outrage to ask an operator to work with a hole six inches square. A foot square is quite small enough, and in large operating rooms they should be 12 by 24 inches. No operator can or will do the best work when compelled to "rubber" through a little, inadequate lookout. It makes his work harder, too, and is utterly senseless from any and every point of view.

"ELECTRA" CARBONS AND THEIR MANUFACTURE.

Few of the moving picture machine operators in the United States who handle carbons in the lamp house give a moment's reflection to the importance, from an industrial point of view, which carbons have in the world of manufacture. A good carbon is ultimately the most essential point of the moving picture business, as it is only with the use of a high-grade carbon that a clear picture can be projected; and not alone are carbons used in the moving picture business, but millions are used in various kinds of arc lighting. In fact, this business is so enormous that in the factory where "Electra" Pink Label Carbons are made, of which the above is an illustration, there are nearly 2,400 hands employed. This factory covers approximately twenty acres of ground, does its own printing, makes its own cases and its own high-grade lampblack.

The "Electra" Pink Label Carbons, which are made in this factory, have a reputation of their own and are really in a class by themselves. They are scientifically manufactured of the very highest grade ingredients, especially for use for projectors, and it is for this reason that they stand up so well and carry the heavy current at the arc. In spite of this heavy current, these carbons do not get red hot, but maintain a beautiful white arc under any circumstances. Therefore the "Electra" Pink Label Carbons have been a very great factor in the enormous growth of the moving picture business.

Besides the "Electra" Pink Label Projector Carbons, this factory makes millions of high-grade "Electra" carbons for use in the enclosed type of arc lamps.

The "Electra" carbon is recognized by all central stations to be the standard for quality, and can always be relied upon to produce a brilliant and steady white light with a minimum of deposit.

In this factory is also made the "Excello" Metal Vein Flaming Carbon. This factory was one of the first to make this type of carbon, and on account of the specially patented form of this metal vein the resistance of the "Excello" carbons is almost nil, thus allowing a maximum amount of current at the arc, which is a very essential feature for this type of lamp, and it brings out all the efficiency there is in the lamp.

A complete line of carbon brushes, electrodes, special carbons for telephones, batteries, etc., are made by these works.

The sole importer of this line of carbons is Mr. Hugo Reisinger, 11 Broadway, New York City, who has handled the goods over seventeen years. The mere fact that these carbons have been on the market so long and have now such a very high reputation, is proof of their popularity and efficiency.

We think every moving picture exhibitor and operator who strives to produce good pictures should make himself practically acquainted with the "Electra" Pink Label Projector Carbons, and if he has not already done so, to get in touch with Mr. Hugo Reisinger, at the address given above, in order that he may have an opportunity of testing and trying out these carbons and so convince himself of their fine quality.

THE STORY OF THE EDENGRAPH.

Two weeks ago we published a description of the Edengraph machine as it appealed to us during a demonstration at the factory. This week we will supplement it with a brief history of the development of the machine, as gathered from an interview with George Kleine:

"About the year 1900, Frank Cannock, a mechanical expert, thoroughly versed in the use of motion picture machines, had constructed a new model which embodied many features never before used, and placed one of these machines in the Eden Musee, Twenty-third street, New York City. The Eden Musee is famous throughout the country, having been in existence many years, and from the beginning of the public exhibition of motion pictures it has made a specialty of them.

"Among the features used in the Edengraph in the year 1900 when placed in position in the Eden Musee, and which is embodied in the present machine almost without change, is a dust-tight oil box in which are placed the shaft, cam and star wheel which actuate the intermittent sprocket.

"The Eden Musee has projected motion pictures on an average of ten times daily since 1900. Mr. Cannock has informed me that the original oil box containing the original shaft, cam and star are still in use, have never been changed, regulated or altered. Mr. Richard G. Hollaman, general manager and chief owner of the Eden Musee, confirms this statement.

"From time to time Mr. Cannock made duplicates of his original machine for friends in the business, possibly three or four all told. Beyond this the machine was not placed upon the market for sale. The first Edengraph that I myself saw was in use at the Delmar Gardens in St. Louis during the World's Fair, at the exhibitions given by Count d'Hauterives, who is well known to the trade as having the largest individual stock of special hand-colored films of anyone in the United States, and whose reputation is that of projecting as perfect a moving picture as is possible with the most advanced appliances. Count d'Hauterives operated his own machine, which he treated like a pet child, and being very much struck with its efficiency I made inquiries as to its origin, who its maker was and what were the prospects of obtaining it for the market. The Count was reticent and would give no information. I had previously heard of the Edengraph that was in operation at the Eden Musee at New York and suspected that the Count's machine was of the same type, but could not confirm the fact until later.

"In the Fall of 1907 I met Frank Cannock in Montreal, and inspected closely a modified sample of the original Edengraph which he intended to place upon the market. Shortly afterward a company was formed called the Edengraph Manufacturing Company for the purpose of manufacturing and exploiting this machine. The chief stockholders were Mr. Hollaman and Mr. Cannock. The inventor transferred to the company his patents embodied in the Edengraph model, other patents then applied for, and agreed to assign to the Edengraph Company any improvements that he might make thereafter in apparatus for taking or projecting motion pictures. Early in 1908 the Edengraph Manufacturing Company issued advertisements offering the machine for sale on some nearby day. An error was made by the company, however, in attempting to save time, in that they contracted to have the work done in shops which they did not own or control instead of giving the requisite time to the installation of their own factory.

"In the Spring of 1908 I contracted for the Kleine Optical Company, through Messrs. Hollaman and Cannock, to take the exclusive Western selling agency, having been thoroughly convinced by that time that the Edengraph had more points in its favor than any other projecting machine known to me. Owing to the great mechanical accuracy required in the construction of the machine, and the impracticability of having it manufactured in a shop not owned by themselves, the Edengraph Manufacturing Company withdrew its tools, models, jigs and parts of machines that had been made in the outside shop, and Mr. Hollaman finding himself unable to give the necessary time to the handling of this venture, offered to sell to me the entire capital stock of the company held by himself and his friends, which I purchased in August, 1908, Mr. Cannock continuing as a stockholder and director. A complete manufacturing plant was installed at 135 West Third street, New York City, and the Edengraph machines have been manufactured in the factory at that address ever since.

"The original machine did not admit of framing by either changing the position of the film gate aperture or of the mechanism, and framed by moving the objective lens up and down, after the manner of the older French machines like the Lumiere Cinematograph. On pointing out to Mr. Cannock the desirability of keeping the objective lens in a fixed position, for optical reasons, he devised a new system of framing the film. He evolved a mechanism which permitted the shutter to remain in a fixed position, which required a width only large enough to cover a single picture, instead of the customary shutter which moves when the picture is being framed, and which must therefore be much larger to cover the aperture when in all positions. This reduced the flicker very materially and gives the Edengraph its reputation for producing a motion picture upon the curtain which is practically flickerless with the machine running at ordinary speed.

"Any exhibitor wishing to test the relative merits of the Edengraph and other projecting machines is invited to set them up side by side, turn on the light and project a disc upon the curtain without a picture. This is the severest test to which a machine can be put to test the absence of flicker, that is to say with only a disc of light upon the curtain, and the shutter revolving in place as when projecting a picture. The shutter is located in close proximity to the film gate—not more than ⅛-inch distant. The purpose of this construction is to permit the use of extremely wide angle lenses, whose rear lens falls very close to the film when in focus. Such lenses are used when projecting from behind the curtain or when the machine must be placed at a very short distance from the curtain, and to project a large picture; it will accept lenses for the shortest to the longest distances.

"The machinery for the manufacture of the Edengraph having been installed in the Fall of 1908, an efficient staff of mechanics was engaged, and in the course of time Edengraphs were finished and sold to various exhibitors and exchanges in the United States and Canada. The experience of many years in marketing projecting machines had taught me conservatism in advertising the Edengraph for delivery before quantities of them were finished and in hand. A limited number of exhibitors and exchanges who were well acquainted with the model took them off our hands as rapidly as they were offered, and not having an advance supply in hand the machine was not advertised.

"The Edengraph Manufacturing Company is now practically ready to fill all orders. A number of applications have been received for selling agencies, but none have been granted as yet, excepting to the Clune Film Exchange, which has exclusive territory in Southern California, Arizona and New Mexico, and the Amalgamated Film Exchange, of Portland and Seattle, which controls Washington and Oregon, to famaximum of perhaps $75.00, when the incumbent would be cilitate deliveries to Far Western customers. An illustrated catalogue will be received from the printer within a few days, and will be mailed free on request.

"The Edengraph is licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company, and is now being offered for sale to all licensed exchanges and exhibitors licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company."

GOTCH-ZBYSZKO WRESTLING MATCH PICTURES.

The Gotch-Zbyszko wrestling match pictures became suddenly more valuable, inasmuch as certain agitators from a reformed standpoint, are using certain classes of the press to engender ill-feeling against the release of the great fight pictures made at Reno by the associated manufacturers, rendering it possibly difficult for certain portions of the country to witness them, and as there can be no agitation against the use of the great wrestling picture of the Gotch-Zbyszko film, it will make an excellent substitute where the exhibitor is prohibited from running the fight pictures.

State rights have been selling for some time, as also with foreign privileges, covering the use of this film, but there still remain a few choice States, and it is the intention of Klank & Herman, who control this film, to have these pictures on exhibition in every State of the Union within fifteen days.

The Australian rights were quickly sold. England and the British possessions are using them extensively. Russia, China, Africa and South America are all making earnest inquiries regarding the securing of same.

From a photographic and accurate standpoint this film has been pronounced by those who have seen it, the best and clearest piece of photography recorded in the cinematographing of sporting events. The film can be seen at any time at the Selig Polyscope Company offices, 45 East Randolph street, Chicago.

The National Independent Moving Picture Alliance met at Niagara on July 16 to establish a working agreement between the exchanges and manufacturers. How far they have succeeded is not yet divulged, but it seems that the harmony between the Associated Independent Manufacturers and Sales Company will extend also to the exchanges.

The Editors' Table.

"Haunted by Conscience" is the title of a new Kalem military drama. The Kalem players have been working along military lines for some time and have had the benefit of the coaching and assistance of one of the most prominent officers in the United States Army at the present time, and their producers assure us that the details of military life are correctly portrayed in every particular.

"Brave Hearts" is the name of the Kalem Indian picture of the week, and in this production, as in those which have been put out previously, the Kalem players have endeavored to portray a well-authenticated incident of real Indian warfare.

"Rambles In Many Lands" is the title of a delightful short book of travel, by John Mackenzie, who is chief of the photographic staff of the Kinemacolor Company, London. John Mackenzie loyally dedicates his book to his friend, Charles Urban. He modestly disclaims being either a skilled literary man or a professional journalist, giving us rather the impression of a busy traveller whose province is the making of photographs. There are twenty or thirty short articles in the book, which reads just like a series of letters sent home from Europe, Africa, India, America, either to a friend or a newspaper. And therein lies their value. They are little, spontaneous word pictures by a keenly observing man, and as such we thoroughly enjoy them. We turn over one page at random. "The idol to which they bow is money. For this they sacrific home, and health, and life, and leisure. The 'almighty dollar,' as they themselves term it, and its attainment by 'hook or crook,' is the whole gamut of the average American's religion. For this he works from thirteen to seventeen hours a day, etc., etc." It will be seen that friend Mackenzie is a very close observer of American national habits. Next to our appreciation of this pleasant little book, we would rank the pleasure of another visit from John Mackenzie in company with some more of his beautiful Kinemacolor pictures.

HAMACEK INVENTS INTERMITTENT DEVICE.

Chicago, Ill., July 7, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I have devised and perfected lately a new intermittent motion device and had it patented. This device will play a most important part in the motion picture business on account of its very novel features. It possesses a merit in which the period of rest of the film in proportion to the movement is 7-4 times. Under severe tests, running it far in excess of ordinary speed necessary for projecting motion pictures, in no case has it broken the film. Such a trial sets aside any question as to its practicability as regards the rapid displacement of the film. Furthermore, the period of rest can be increased, if so wanted, or diminished. Some of the advantages derived by the employment of this device in connection with motion picture apparatus are as follows: When used in connection with a projector it permits the speed of the shutter to be increased to more than twofold, if wanted, and still maintain synchronism between the shutter and the intermittent motion movement of the film. Consequently, by its use, it is obvious that the shutter will assume a velocity sufficient to prevent flickering even though the machine is run below ordinary speed. This, of course, means less displacement of the film at the same time. What such a feature means as an advancement in the picture line is most striking and becomes a matter of most vital importance in the production of motion pictures and their projection. Under tests it appeared that an economy of the film could be effected approaching 30 to 40 per cent.; assuming that it was but 20 per cent., it means an immense saving in making up films, together with the raw material.

For another reason this new intermittent motion device is bound to play a very important part in the picture industry, in that it is of a nature which will make it possible to expose films to view, or to the light in photography for a greater period in the line of colored photography. Whether it would be on films of single sequence, or of several sequences of pictures. It shows the advantage plainly even in this one respect where the film may be of several degrees of sensitization and of different natures so as to receive such colors of impression as may be desired, that the exposure can be made any thing out of one period of displacement of the film, by adjusting the sizes of shutters to fit it, and to have them revolve synchronizingly.

This device means one of the greatest advancements in the motion picture industry, both as to perfection of display and economy of production, and the patent rights are for sale. Very truly, ADOLPH F. RAMACEK, Owner.

THE FIGHT FILM WAR.

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 9, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—Judging from what newspapers say about the fight pictures, I would like to give and express my opinion of same, and I trust this will interest some at least.

My judgment is that the trouble concerning the fight pictures is due to the public in general.

Long before the fight contracts were settled, I predicted this trouble; not the making of the pictures, but the foolish and insane ideas and actions of the people.

To begin with, I may as well mention this fact: When visiting a show consisting of moving pictures, some people applaud when the hero makes some brave move; others applaud in appreciation when the subject is ended. The former, I claim, is foolish and the latter is sane. The same can be said now in regard to the coming fight pictures that the famous Vitagraph people are to produce.

If the public does not see them, it is not the fault of the producer, but the people, simply for the reason of their insane ideas.

The public wanted to see a fair fight. There is but one way to see one, and that is when the best man wins. The best man did win; what more can be done? When the people who paid to see the battle are satisfied with the results, why should it bother the rest.

There are thousands of people besides myself who are interested in this, and who would like to see the pictures of this fight, but probably must be refused the pleasure, because thousands of others cannot see them without losing their minds, thereby causing riots, etc.

What is the sense of all this? If they only stop to think a little, they would probably see their own foolishness.

Jeffries is white, and fought for the United States; Johnson is black, but fought also for the United States. Should the people not be satisfied, then, when the United States still holds the championship of the world? If each and every citizen could read this, the foolish ones would probably regain their lost senses.

If this trouble comes up very often, moving pictures, one of our greatest amusements, will soon find a resting place, and should it be so the public can only blame themselves.

ALBERT OHLSON.

Delphi, Ind., F. R. D. No. 6, July 9, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—The asinine attitude adopted by certain people of authority, in the sadly abused cause of morality, by forbidding the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures throughout the States (north of the Mason-Dixon line), is without doubt one of the most ridiculous gnat-and-camel affairs ever discussed in our American newspapers.

The chief executive of a city in the Central States, gave out the following for publication: "I will prevent the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures here, if possible," said the Mayor. "Their influence would be detrimental upon the public mind, particularly upon the young. The exhibition would be a species of the prize-fight itself. I have no use personally for any such thing."

My personal advice to this garrulous, would-be reformer is to subject his own city to a thorough renovation and part his hair in the middle before stampeding into print, to discuss a question of morality far beyond his dogmatical comprehension.

With an exception of the cities numbering a large colored population, already in the preliminary throes of a race war, can a mayor place the ban on the fight pictures, and even then without making a public announcement of his own inability, as chief executive, to govern his city properly?

With the gaming feature of the ring carefully eliminated, I very much doubt if any unprejudiced, well-balanced mind can advance a logical argument to show that prize-fighting exercises a demoralizing effect on the spectators.

If the ring sport has an evil effect on the spectators, how much more than horse-racing, football, wrestling, motor-racing, or the appalling feats performed, high up in the circus tent, by the daring acrobat, before thousands of children?

Should the performer make a slight mistake, or suffer a momentary indisposition, death swift and shocking to behold, must follow; still we look on and applaud.

Why, even to-day in some States under the American flag, criminals condemned to death are hanged in public, which has excited little if any comment, unless it be to depict the morbid details of such a hanging.

The Governor of a State can no more prohibit the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures through the elastic medium of civil process, than he could suppress Rex Beach's graphic, nerve-tingling account of the big fight at Reno.

In the former we simply see the fight, while in the latter we indulge the five senses to their utmost capacity; in fact, we are there. There at the ringside with the bellowing thousands, we breathe the very atmosphere of the huge amphitheater; we taste the humid air, redolent with that musk ever identified with a vast concourse of people; we thrill with the delirious excitement of the moment, and are glad, insanely glad, we are there.

If all Americans, whose veins pulsate with honest red blood, hot with life, were granted a wish, these effeminate knockers of athletics, these narrow-minded, versatile advocators of muscles to match their own intellectual powers, would be presented with a copy of Dante's famous poem illustrated by Dore, as an indispensable guide book, considering their inevitable destination, and that right heartily.

Yours truly, CHARLES N. SIMS.

Portage, Wis., July 9, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Referring to the sentiments that are expressed in the different journals and the Moving Picture World as to the prize-fight pictures. In trying to be a Christian myself, as no doubt millions of others are doing, who think that prize-fighting and the showing of pictures of the same is anything but elevating, to say nothing of the bad influence on the young, I would like to ask you if you do not think it better for a paper that has the good standing in the moving picture business, to try and cut out all or most of the display on the subject of these fights.

You have stood all along for the clean class of films, and the cutting out of the "blood and thunder," and hold-up work, robberies and such stuff. We are all eagerly reading up the elevating part of the picture business, but does it not seem that there is big money enough in the business, without spreading and pushing a subject that is certainly offensive to at least the whole church world, who have a right to put their judgment abreast with any others to the contrary? If we are going to "purify" the picture business, for goodness sake let us begin where it seems to need it the most. The recent declaration of the Christian Endeavorers certainly voices all good sentiments on the question.

When the Governors of many of the States are prohibiting the fight pictures as they would the fight, and when so many of the mayors of the larger cities are doing the same, it would seem that the Moving Picture World can see its way clear to voice the sentiment and still "be fair to all alike." Let the good moral work that even the films can create, go on; but for heaven's sake keep out such "flarebacks" as this, or it will take a year or more to get back to the proper sentiment.

Yours very truly,
H. W. GRIGGS.

[For the benefit of friend Griggs and others we wish to say that we are in sympathy with the Christian Endeavorers and other reformers. But we want to point out that their efforts are wasted. What they should have done was to prevent the fight itself. We have seen the pictures and they are far less debasing than the newspaper accounts of the fight. In fact, there is nothing in them that shows even brutality. Moreover, they will not be exhibited promiscuously in family theaters and no one need see them without a mind predisposed to such exhibitions.—Eds. M. P. W.]

Boonville, Ind., July 8, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Of course, editorials are appearing in the papers throughout the States relative to the Johnson-Jeffries fight film, but of all these, the enclosed is the best. In no instance has the idea been expressed so thoroughly, and I am anxious that you copy it for the Moving Picture World. It is clipped from the Evansville (Ind.) "Courier." It's the real goods and resulted in the local mayor and city council favoring the showing of the film in Boonville, and it will be shown here all O. K. Tell "Pop" Rock that he should let us have an early "crack" at that. Just name the exchange and we will do the remainder. Thanking you for this opportunity, we are,

Bring On the Pictures.

This protest against the moving pictures of the fight is extremely silly. The fear that they will incite racial discord is foolish. Why should they? If America has the most superbly developed fighting man in the world, we should be proud of it, whether he is white or black. If every negro were a Johnson they would be a valuable national asset. The army could well afford to have a few regiments of Johnsons. Why should any white man be jealous of the black man, who has triumphed in a contest of strength employed with skill? A negro won the prize for oratory at Yale a few years ago. Is that cause for a race riot? It would be singular indeed if the negro could not outdistance all others along certain lines of development. The white race never rose to supremacy through brute strength. A man cannot cope with a lion in a naked contest. Hurrah for Johnson, the black champion! We are glad that he is an American. Whenever any of our white pugilists feel fit to challenge him, let them go to it. It matters not a whit to us whether the strongest man in the country is black or white.

As for the moving pictures we confess we should like to see this superb black panther in action. If prize-fighting is so brutal as to be revolting to the sensibilities of the public, the best way to stop it is to throw the pictures on the screen and let them see it. They will hurt no one and cause no disorders.

At one of the theaters this week we have the moving pictures showing King Edward's funeral. They are wonderful—as clear and vivid as if one really saw the splendid procession of royal equestrians and equipage moving before his eyes, from Buckingham to Westminster.

The moving pictures are educational. In order to pass intelligent judgment on the subject of the prize-fight and its moral and humane aspects, let us see the pictures of it.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—It is with a strange feeling of exultant pride that I take up the gauntlet thrown down by the daily papers to the moving picture manufacturers, and endeavor to answer the varied and numerous articles on the pictures of the recent Johnson and Jeffries contest.

I will not ask the reader to bear with me long, nor will I preach or rant on the great good that the moving picture has done in the past and will do in the future, but in a series of questions, I will ask the reader to answer to his own satisfaction, and then judge for himself, as to which is the greatest sinner—the newspaper or the moving picture.

1. Was it the moving picture or the newspaper that for the past two years has cried out to James J. Jeffries to bear the so-called burden of the white race and fight J. Arthur Johnson?

2. Was it the moving picture or the newspaper that called the attention of the world to this event and actually made it possible?

3. Was it the moving picture or the newspaper up to this date (July 9) that has detailed the "cut lips, bruised eyes, terrible falls," and the so-called "terrible brutality" of the fight?

4. Is it any more corrupting to our youth to show them the pictures of a prize-fight, than it is to place in their hands a copy of the daily newspaper in which they can read of the filth of some divorce scandal, the horrors of rape, arson and murder? Where by looking at the advertisements of the department stores, see half-nude female figures, clad only in underclothing, or the nude figure of a woman seated in some patent bathtub, or of some barefoot dancer who has not pride enough to cover the body with proper raiment.

Now I would ask you, honored reader, which is the worst sinner, the newspaper or the moving picture?

MOVING PICTURES IN CHURCH.

Chicago is said to gather on Sunday evenings one-sixth of its entire population into 466 amusement places where moving pictures are the chief attractions. Other cities compete in their several capacities. "The theaters and five and ten-cent shows are thronged," observes The Michigan Christian Advocate (Detroit), "while the churches are thinly attended." From this statement the following question is an easy transition: Why should not the church be as wise as the world and go in for moving picture attractions? asks the Literary Digest.

The Methodist journal takes the query seriously, as the following shows:

"It is thought that inasmuch as the church attractions would be free, the crowds would prefer them.

"As for the pictures, 'the thrilling stories of the Old Testament, and the beautiful tales of the New Testament, together with modern illustrations of Christian heroism' would, it is said, make attractive up-to-date shows.

"At first blush this suggestion would seem to many like a plausible thing, progressive, 'up-to-date,' and promising of good results.

"It would, perhaps, not be much more of an innovation on old-fashioned worship than much of the hired music is. And it probably would not cost much more than some churches pay their artistic singers. Is it righteous to make artistic appeal to the ear to capture a crowd, and wicked to make artistic appeal to the eye?

"Moreover, on the score of innovation alone, the suggestion could not be condemned, especially by Methodists. John Wesley adopted an innovation when he took to field preaching, which he did not like, in lieu of the regular pulpit, which he did like. Methodists are adopting innovations all the time, and will continue to do so."

This journal is not insensible to the "serious objections" natural to the suggestion "There is probably no form of entertainment so hard on the eye, and indirectly upon the health, as motion pictures in low, stuffy rooms" Moreover:

"Only the most exciting scenes can long sustain interest in such tiresome exhibitions. 'The thrilling stories of the Old Testament' and 'the beautiful tales of the New Testament' would have to be fixed up in very catchy style if the crowds which have been surfeited on prize fight shows and other current excitement are to be drawn to the churches. The official boards, too, would have to come down with a lot of cash to buy new negatives by the thousand feet for each recurring Sunday evening performance.

"It is said that fully $60,000,000 has been invested in picture shows by the fraternity who have converted old stores and halls in every town and village into five-cent picture parlors. Is the church prepared to compete with that outlay?

"But the moving picture business is here to stay, and if the churches wish to combine and send their preachers around giving shows somewhat after the early circuit method, they can thus save some of the expense in 'filling the churches,' or trying to."

The Difference Between Sincere Affection and Capricious Infatuation

Most unique is the plot of this Biograph film story. It shows how a young chemist became infatuated with the youngest of two sisters despite the sincere love of the eldest for him. The young sister's pretty face and attractive personality intoxicated him to such a degree that he fancied she loved him. While working in his laboratory there is an explosion which apparently destroys his sight and hearing, rendering him for the time helpless. This helplessness bores the young wife, and she eagerly accepts diversion. She finally decides to leave him and go on the stage. She leaves a letter to this effect and her wedding ring on the table. This the sister finds and wears to deceive the poor husband until he shall have passed his affliction. The operation proves a success, and the sister hurries to bring the wife back before the bandage is taken off his eyes. This is so that he may never realize the truth. The removal of the bandage takes place in a darkened room, and as the young husband steps towards his wife, she recoils guiltily. In doing so, she clutches at the heavy portieres covering the window. Down they come, letting in a vivid shaft of light, which, striking his sensitive eyes, causes now incurable blindness.

AS THE BELLS RANG OUT. The power of dissembling is probably one of the greatest gifts afforded the human being. It has saved us from calamity and disaster; it has prevented woe and sorrow. In this case it allowed to transpire without a cloud the happiest occasion in the lives of two young people—their wedding. Grace, the daughter of Gilbert Allen, is sought in marriage by Wilson Breen, a young man of wealth. The father cheerfully approves of the match and the day for the wedding is set for six months hence. The momentous day arrives and all is in readiness. The bride to be has just left her father for her room, after his reviewing of her attired in her trousseau, when he receives a letter warning him that his connection with an illegitimate trust fund deal has been discovered, and advising him to fly. It is an affair in the like of which many a reputable banker has before been involved; simply an idiosynerasy of the money market. To fly would be cowardly, besides it might mean the death of his daughter on such a day as this. Well, he makes a clean breast of it to his son-in-law to be, and gives him a chance to back out. That young man, grasping his hand, exclaims: "No, I will not give her up. We need each other now more than ever. We must keep her in ignorance of it." At this point the detectives arrive to take Allen away, but being humane allow the ceremony to take place with them hiding behind a screen. Allen gives his daughter in marriage to Breen and bestows the parental blessing as the happy couple leave for their honeymoon, and before the sound of the wedding bells has died out he is led off to prison by the detectives.

SERIOUS SIXTEEN.—"When love is young all the world seems gay." Thus chants troubadour under milady's window, but——. Well, we must confess there are fleeting clouds and threatening storms during that period. "Serious Sixteen" would seem a paradoxical expression, still the sixteen year old can become awfully serious, as we will show. Tom and Adele are sweethearts and decide that they must marry. Papa gives consent, but enjoins that they must wait four years. Four years! a lifetime. They simply cannot abide by this decision, and resolve to terminate an unendurable existence, hence they form a suicide pact. Their courage fails in the attempted commission of it, so they decide to elope. While Adele goes to get her belongings, a couple of sanctimonious misses appear and for a lark bestow upon the nerve-shaken Tom undue attentions. Adele arrives and from what she witnesses, becomes furiously jealous, losing her faith in poor Tom, and leaves him still forcibly detained by the mischief makers. Going home, she determines to be through with the world and join the Salvation Army. When Tom hears of this he, too, decides upon the religious and becomes a friar. The extent of their avowals is the purchase of the costumes of the costumers. Her firm purpose, however, is soon weakened by the present from papa of a picture hat. As she dons this, Tom elders, and seeing her backslide, he, too, apostatizes, reasoning it is better to wait four years, than to suffer as they had during this one day.

A FLASH OF LIGHT.—The difference between love and infatuation is generally marked, but how often are we indifferent to the dictates of our soul. The sight of a pretty face and an attractive personality nearly always intoxicates us to such a degree as to make us believe that our impulses are induced by the heart and soul, but what a fallacy. It is by the sight that we are hypnotized and though the eyes may be the windows of the soul, still under certain influence an intercepting shade is drawn. This was the condition of John Rogers, a young chemist, who is sincerely loved by the eldest of two sisters, but in a state of infatuation prefers the younger girl, fascinated by what he would call vivacity, but which is nothing less than frivolousness. He marries her, and she soon tires of a life of domesticity. He tries to interest her in his chemical experiments but they simply bore her, although they are interesting to the sister, which interest is born of a pure love which she still holds. While he is working in his laboratory, the wife is either entertaining or being entertained by friends. She is in her element at a dinner party, when an explosion takes place in her husband's laboratory, apparently destroying his sight and hearing. It is a sad house she returns to after her evening's pleasure. There is her husband, deaf and sightless. You may imagine her lot is now more repugnant, as his helplessness annoys her, so she eagerly accepts diversion. This comes in the form of an offer from one of her friends, a theatrical manager, to shine on the comic opera stage. She accepts the offer and on the persuasion of this friend decides to leave her husband and get a divorce, leaving her wedding ring on the table for her sister or father-in-law to find. The sister sees her action, and tries to dissuade her, but in vain. The thought of this second and worse blow to the young man moves the sister to wear the ring, deceiving him until his affliction has passed, for the doctor is sure of restoring his sight and hearing. This deception is easy, as he can neither see nor hear and is ever under hands of the nurse. The operation promises to be successful, so the sister goes to the green room of the theater to bring the wife back. After a heated argument the wife consents to go and see him at least, arriving just as he is placed in a darkened room to have the bandage removed. When the bandage is taken off, the young man sees in the dim light of the room the figures about him. He turns from one to the other until he sees his wife and makes a move towards her, but she with guilty mien recoils and as she does, clutches the portieres nervously. Down they come, letting in a fatal flash of light from the outside, striking the poor fellow's eyes, causing now incurable blindness. Realizing what she has done, she rushes horror stricken from the house. The young man's hearing unimpaired, he learns the truth and now feels in his heart what he failed to see with his eyes.

OLD LOVES AND THE NEW.—John Stanley falls in love with Ethel Winslow and they become engaged. John is the son of a wealthy father who, when his son tells him of the engagement, advises the young fellow that he should learn to make a living for himself before entering the matrimonial field. John takes his father's advice. The South African gold fields attract him and he goes there, after bidding a fond farewell to Ethel. Meanwhile Ethel meets and falls in love with Austin Brooks, and allows herself to accept from him a love token. John Stanley is successful in his South African work and has discovered gold. We see him at the bungalow home of his friend, Allan Jones, in South Africa, discussing means of interesting capital in the gold prospect which he has discovered.

Helen Jones, the sister of his friend, is on the scene, and we become aware of the fact that John is attracted to the beautiful sister of his old time friend. A plan is finally arranged. Jones writes a friend in New York to insert an advertisement in the New York papers asking for a partner with ten thousand dollars capital to operate a South African gold mine, communications in response to which are to be addressed to Allan Jones, Rambezi, South Africa.

Austin Brooks sees this advertisement in New York and having some capital concludes to go to South Africa and look into the matter. He in turn bids good-bye to Ethel Winslow. On arriving in South Africa Brooks meets John at the home of Allan Jones, and a mutual friendship as well as a partnership develops. Neither man makes any mention of Ethel Winslow, though both faithfully correspond with her. Everything goes well with John and Brooks and they develop a very rich mine.

John, however, is taken with fever and is forced to rest at the home of Jones. Here Helen shows a silent devotion for the handsome friend of her brother. Her dream of happiness is scattered, however, when she accidentally comes upon a photograph of Ethel Winslow, on the back of which is inscribed the following:

"To Jack—

With love from your affianced wife

Ethel."

From this moment Helen is cold toward John, although it is plain to be seen that she is deeply in love with him.

John leaves for New York to regain his full health and, true to his engagement with Ethel, has no other idea than to marry her. During John's absence in Africa his father has been a constant visitor at the home of Ethel Winslow and her mother. He was present when Brooks called to say good-bye to Ethel, and later, while the young men are hewing out their destinies under the burning sun of South Africa, the old gentleman happens to read a letter from Brooks to Ethel, in which he (Brooks) speaks of returning to America and making her his wife. The suspicions aroused at the first visit are now confirmed and he sees Ethel is not in love with his son.

After John's return to New York his father, hoping to prevent the marriage between John and Ethel, cables to Austin Brooks a message which calls him immediately to New York. The day that Brooks receives the cablegram in South Africa he is visiting the home of Allan Jones and his sister who by a strange coincidence are preparing to go to New York. Brooks shows the cablegram to them and they agree to go together. On their arrival in New York they visit John's home. Here the elder Stanley becomes pleasantly aware of the fact that his son John is desperately smitten with the girl from Africa and that the feeling is reciprocated. A new light falls upon him and his whole plan of campaign changes. He manages to bring Austin Brooks to the home of Ethel just as she and John are in close conversation, and just as a tense situation is about precipitated he introduces Helen Jones as the fiancee of his son John. This is a surprise to John and Helen, but it relieves the situation for Ethel. Helen sees that Ethel agrees and she acquiesces.

The scene closes with Ethel slightly pressing the hand of John's father, happiness for both couples and contentment beaming from the face of the clever arranger of the destinies of the four young people.

A FRONTIER HERO. The action of this story takes place on the frontier of Kentucky in 1800. Inside a stockade several settlers have their log cabin homes. The family with which we are concerned consists of a frontiersman his wife and four children the oldest, Tom, a boy of fourteen the youngest a baby girl, Ruth. The children have a constant playmate in a magnificent collie dog called Shep. One day the father goes hunting with the other men of the settlement. In their anxiety to be early at the hunting ground they forget to close the gate of the stockade. At about this point the adventure which is portrayed in the picture begins.

Ruth sees a favorable opportunity to investigate the region beyond the stockade, and, while her mother is in another part of the cabin and her older sister is busily engaged in poking the ashes in the open fireplace, she quietly walks out of the cabin door and on through the stockade, and rambles off into the hills. On returning to the room the mother misses the child. Tom and his younger brother are bringing in logs for the fire, and to her questions as to the whereabouts of the baby they answer that they haven't seen her. The little sister whose back was turned tells the mother that the baby was "right there," pointing to the place where the baby was playing on the floor with Shep. The mother sends Tom one way and, taking the girl with her, goes in the opposite direction, in the meantime alarming the neighbors in the settlement.

Returning to the cabin in the hope that Ruth may have wandered back, the mother discovers for the first time the open gate in the stockade. A great fear seizes her. Tom, a boy of quick mind, calls Shep, shows him the little bonnet belonging to his baby sister, and talks earnestly to the dog. The intelligent brute seems to understand, for, hardly allowing Tom time enough to slip a rope around his neck and grasp a rifle, he darts out through the door of the cabin and on out the gate. Ruth has meanwhile wandered away, stopping now and then and picking wild flowers as she goes. A hostile Indian skulking near the settlement has found the child and made off with her.

We now see an exciting hunt. Over the ground where we have seen the Indian take the child we watch the boy, led by the dog, following the trail. The Indian, feeling safe from pursuit, slackens his pace and is about to rest for a moment, when Tom and Shep discover him in the distance. He hears the approach of the boy and the dog at the same time and, quickly letting the baby down, turns on Tom and flees. Tom is also quick with his weapon and shoots at the Indian. Shep dashes on toward the Indian, but as the savage falls and struggles away the dog changes his mind and goes to protect the baby girl. Tom struggles, wounded as he is, toward the dog and the child and, taking his handkerchief from about his neck, he ties it on that of the dog and commands him to go home.

The faithful brute seems to realize that something urgent is expected of him, for immediately he accepts the command, dashes on and away toward the settlement. For a moment Tom talks to his sister and then suddenly faints away. The little one, not understanding his silence, tries to rouse him by shaking him. Unsuccessful and thinking that he is asleep, she lies down beside him, places her prone little head upon big brother's breast and finally falls asleep herself.

We now follow Shep in his heroic race for help. We see him cross a mountain stream, dash on down to the settlement and arrive at the outside of the stockade just after the father has returned with his friends from the hunt. While they are in the cabin listening to the agonizing story of the loss of the baby they hear Shep's bark and rush to the stockade gate to admit the faithful brute. Seeing Tom's bandaged head they immediately start back after the dog, who bounds away ahead of them.

When they arrive at the scene of the fight they find Tom lying on the ground and his baby sister peacefully sleeping with her head resting on big brother's shoulder. For a moment it is feared that Tom has been killed, but when they revive him they find that his wound is slight. The fond parents of course are in ecstasies of delight over the finding of the baby, and also over the fact that Tom is not seriously injured. In all this the faithful dog is not lost sight of and comes in for many a hearty pat.

THE THIEF. Sherwin Bramwell, the noted detective, is leaving his apartments when, in turning into the street walk he collides with a gentleman coming from the opposite direction. Both are jarred and in the collision the pedestrian's hat is knocked off. Bramwell stops, recovers the hat, and returns it to its owner with apologies. As he is about to turn away, a flitting expression crosses the stranger's face, which arouses a certain memory in the detective's mind but he turns away, unable to find a name for the gentleman. This latter carries a cane, is well groomed, and the encounter has proven him courteous and decorous.

Some time later, Carlos Montague, alias "Crafty Nick," our gentleman of the cane, enters his bachelor apartments in a fashionable hotel and makes ready to attend an evening reception at one of the homes of the New York Smart Set. Later, arrayed in evening dress he takes his cane, looks at his watch and hurries out.

We next return to Bramwell, who has returned from his walk and who immediately endeavors to find some clue to identify the man whom he had encountered as he left his house. After a search through his collection of photographs of famous rogues he comes upon the one he is searching for, the photograph of Carlos Montague, "diamond thief suspect."

We are next shown a scene at the reception where Montague is ushered in and introduced by Mrs. Roberts, the hostess, to her friends who have never met him. However, there are many there who have met him and it is clearly evident that the gentleman has a firm foothold in society.

During the course of the evening Mrs. Roberts upon the request of certain curious friends opens a cabinet containing relics and curios, explaining the history of each article. Among these is a stiletto cane with a gruesome history.

After the examination of the curios is through Mrs. Roberts excuses herself to her friends to go to her room and wash her hands. Montague is standing near as she dusts her hands and notes the array of rings on the lady's fingers. A quick thought, and, watching his chance he slips quietly out after her and hurries cautiously up the stair to his hostess' chamber. There she arrives and removes the rings, placing them on her dressing table. As she disappears into the adjoining room, Montague steals into the room, hides behind a portier near the dressing table and at the opportune moment snatches the jewels and hurries out.

The discovery of the robbery is made a moment later when Mrs. Roberts returns. Frantically she and the maid search the room, then, cautioning silence, she hurriedly descends the stairs calls her daughter and this latter's fiancee aside and tells them of the robbery. The young man advises that they communicate with Bramwell. Bramwell, in answer to the 'phone call, promises to go to them immediately and a few minutes later he and his assistant are at the place and in consultation with Mrs. Roberts.

Bramwell sees the thief in the crowd and immediately concludes that he has the jewels. Then he reveals his identity and asks permission to search the gentlemen guests. Montague is left to the last, but a thorough search of the clothes of the thief fails to reveal the rings.

Not discouraged, Bramwell waves them off and paces the room vainly striving to locate the jewels. Absentmindedly he picks up the stiletto cane from a chair where it was placed by the hostess, unscrews the top and brings out the stiletto. A sudden thought flashes through his mind as he recalls the cane carried by Montague. The jewels must be concealed in the cane!

The crowd returns and Bramwell calls Montague aside. A moment of conversation, each of the two men working warily around the subject of the cane. Finally Bramwell brings out the photograph of the "diamond thief suspect" and follows up its exhibition with a direct accusation that Mrs. Roberts' rings are concealed in the hollow of Montague's cane. Montague, with a cry of rage raises the cane to strike, but it is wrenched from his hands and Bramwell coolly unscrews the top and rolls the jewels out into his palm.

A moment later the defeated thief bows his adieu to the guests and goes out with a policeman, while Bramwell returns the jewels to Mrs. Roberts and bids her and her guests good evening.

THE DESPERADO.—"Black Bart," a Western bad man, is much wanted by the county sheriff and a proclamation to this effect, offering a reward of $5,000 for the bad man's capture, has been posted. At the opening of the film we see the wily criminal laughing good-naturedly at the ominous warning, which he proceeds to riddle with bullets from his revolver before riding away.

We are next shown the sheriff's office. This dignitary is assembling a posse to make a raid on Black Bart in his desert lair and to bring him back, dead or alive. We see them ride away and some time later draw up in a rocky ravine to make explorations in the neighborhood.

Their horses are corralled and left to take care of themselves while the search party climb over the stones up the hillside to a rocky eminence which offers a view of the surrounding country. While they are thus engaged Black Bart rides up the ravine and spots the posse's horses. Struck with the humor of the situation, as he sees it, he resolves to make away with the mounts, which he does successfully, hiding them in another part of the ravine. Then he steals out carefully to reconnoitre.

The sheriff and his gang return and find their horses gone. This is evidently Black Bart's work and they resolve that if he is in the neighborhood to make the capture. To insure a quick search the sheriff divides his party into one and two to each division and sends them out by various and separate paths.

Black Bart is on the lookout and when his worst enemy, the sheriff himself, comes into view behind a rocky jetty, he covers him with his gun and before the astonished sheriff can regain his senses has deprived him of his gun and ordered him to "beat it."

Black Bart hurries off in the opposite direction examining the sheriff's gun and watching warily for others of the party. A moment later two of the posse come in sight and are confronted by the bad man's gun so quickly that they make little resistance when he also takes their pistols.

There are but two others of the party yet to be corralled and Bart waits for them. A moment or two later they also come into view and the performance is repeated. When Bart has sent them hurriedly on their way the bad man laughs and examines the weapons of his disarmed foe. With a sudden inspiration he hurries back to the corral where the horses of the sheriff's party are confined, ties the bunch to one string and gallops easily off toward town.

By this time the sheriff and his gang have met and are commenting vitriolically on what blundering fools they have been. One man, single-handed, has robbed them of their horses, guns and honor. It is ten miles to town and the sun is shooting little red darts of fire on the long snaky road toward town.

Black Bart canters into town by the alleyway and leaves the horses and the sheriff's weapons back of this latter's office with a curt note to the sheriff and his boys. Later the boys, footsore and limp, drag themselves into town, whereupon the sheriff immediately tenders his resignation to the county board.

Two days later, in answer to the ad. from the county board, a strapping big cowboy enters the office of the board and applies for the job of sheriff. He is asked if he would be afraid to tackle Black Bart. He answers that he will capture the bad man if they promise to give him a permanent job. This is agreed to and the cowboy rides back home to show his wife and baby his star. Then he explains to his wife just how he will effect the capture of Black Bart. She makes a bandage for his uninjured hand in which he slips a short-barreled revolver. Then he kisses his wife and baby goodby and promises to bring the bad man back with him.

Next we see him seated in a stage coach on his way over the hills to the vicinity of the bad man's latest depredations. Bart is waiting for the coach and the usual hold-up occurs. But when he examines the supposed wounded cowboy a bolt of lightning flashes from the victim's bandaged hand and the bad man falls wounded.

A few hours later the experimental sheriff and his captive enter the office of the county board. The cowboy sheriff is congratulated and receives his permanent appointment as sheriff of the county.

THE FAILURE OF SUCCESS.—This film tells of a doctor who, during the course of his researches, makes a great discovery. He becomes famous through this, and is invited into society. At a society function he is captivated by the charms of a noted actress, who, however, does not return his infatuation. He meditates suicide, but the sight of a convent child leads him back to his wife and children. The work of the child actors is especially effective, while interior settings are more than ordinarily expensive.

THROUGH THE ENEMY'S LINE.—Officer in camp calls for volunteer to carry dispatches. Hazardous journey started, but met by the enemy. Carrier shot and left for dead. The Little Goatherd, hearing shots, runs to the spot and discovers the wounded soldier. Returns to the house for assistance. Dispatch carrier explains his mission, when the brave boy offers to try and get through the lines. Falls in with outposts, who, not satisfied with his explanation, arrest him and start for camp. The Goatherd waits his opportunity, and pushes his captor over a precipice. Successful arrival with papers into the right hands. Highly commended for his bravery.

BRAVE HEARTS.—It is a well-known fact that the Indians held an insane person in great veneration, regarding such an unfortunate as one touched by the hand of the mighty Manitou and hence immune from harm. The story centers around this theme. Marauding Indians attack a little frontier cabin while the men folks are away and the young mother and her little daughter left alone. Knowing the peril of the little girl and grieving her own danger, the mother feigns madness and boldly walks out among the redskins while the little girl makes a wonderful ride for help and safety on her sturdy cow pony. The mother's madness is so well simulated that she actually succeeds in leading the Indians to a point where it had been agreed that the little girl would bring help, and it is needless to say that the great climax of the picture is the capture of the redskins, the rescue of the brave woman and the reunion with her little daughter.

HAUNTED BY CONSCIENCE.—Two young men of sturdy New England stock are in love with the same girl. The favorite lover, however, is somewhat timid and fails to see that he is indeed the choice of the girl. In his disappointment he decides to enlist in the regular army. The other lover proposes and is rejected, and he too decides to enter the army. The young men enlist and are sent with their regiment to the Philippines. There their company is detailed to a place after Moro bandits. Here the favorite lover proves himself a real hero and loses his life in an attempt to cover the cowardice of his friend. The survivor goes back home after his enlistment expires and attempts to claim the girl. His suit is favored, but continually he is haunted by the ghostly presence of his dead friend, and even before the marriage altar the apparition appears in time to prevent the ceremony.

G. MELIES.

A POSTAL SUBSTITUTE.—When our picture opens Joe Flynn, a rider in the service of the Government, has been shot from ambush by a masked man and is dying. Grouped at his bedside are his son, Jack, a sturdy young man; the local doctor and the county sheriff. The old man dies and a week later we see Jack delivering the mail. The sheriff has inserted the description of the murderer in the Yuma Gulch Herald, and the country is being scoured to find him.

Jack has a long and perilous ride between the two points of his route and is frequently beset with danger.

Steve Benson, a desperado, who has killed old man Flynn, is living unhappily with his wife in hourly fear of having his crime discovered. His wife has read the murderer's description in the Yuma Gulch paper and the offer of a $1,000 reward. She suspects her husband, and, when in an altercation with her, she becomes convinced of his guilt, she writes to Sheriff Gordon and gives the information necessary to arrest Benson.

She posts the letter with Jack, when he rides by, and her husband suspects what she has done and wrings a confession from her. He knows that his only hope of freedom lies in intercepting the letter, and so follows Jack to the turning point in his daily trip, where he is wont to change horses and dine at the home of George Stone, whose daughter, May, he expects to make his wife.

Benson comes while Jack is eating, and succeeds in slipping a sleeping potion in the latter's coffee. Jack falls asleep, but before Benson has an opportunity to extract the letter from the mail sack, May returns and, being unable to arouse her sweetheart, she rides with the mail back to Yuma Gulch. Benson follows in his endeavor to get the letter, and when he decides that the chase is hopeless, returns to his cabin, collects the small hoard he has there and rides for the mountains and freedom.

In the meantime the letter has been delivered to Sheriff Gordon and he sets out with a posse to capture Benson. Jack, who has recovered, joins them on the way, and after a long chase they come upon the wounded Benson and arrest him.

Jack is deeply grateful for the services rendered him by his faithful sweetheart, and announces to the assembled cowboys his intention of making May his wife as soon as his father's death is avenged.

for the daughter. Eunice, has been his reason for violating his usual business caution and lending money without security. The debt has reached $5,000 and Graham, now sure of his position, demands the return of the money or Eunice's hand. He knows very well that Mrs. Vaughn has lost her margins and that she will do her utmost to persuade her daughter to the marriage, though Eunice loves a young lawyer. To save her mother she assents to the marriage, but life is even more unpleasant than she had feared, for Graham is a miser at heart, and he is moved to a transport of rage at the sight of the new dress and hat that the Eunice's first purchases. To prevent a recurrence of the extravagance he takes the money from her pocketbook and is putting it in the safe when he hears a sound. Not knowing that Miss Eunice, having his home to return to be married, he supposes it to be a burglar, and fearful lest his precious hoard be stolen, he extracts up a revolver prepared to fight for his possessions. The revolver is knocked from the desk and is discharged. The noise alarms the household and when the door is broken in Graham is found dead. The interest is held tense to the last picture and the climax is as unexpected as it is appreciated.

PATHE FRERES.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY. Heloise Helbronn, married to a man for whom she has little affection, is beloved by a young lieutenant. Count Lanvale, a friend of her husband, has also fallen in love with her, and he madly succumbs to his irresistible desire to tell her so. Heloise begs him to refrain from ever again speaking of the matter.

Unfortunately, Helbronn later on discovers his wife in the act of reading a note from the young lieutenant; he wrests it from her, but in the struggle she is able to tear off the signature. Count Lanvale's recent behavior convinces Helbronn, however, that he is the writer of the note, and he threatens to kill him. Heloise, afraid for the sake of the lieutenant to tell the truth, warns Lanvale of what she has done, begging him at the same time to forgive her. But Lanvale is not a coward, and although he guards her secret, Helbronn's insults oblige him to accept his challenge.

The two men meet, and it is Helbronn who falls. Lanvale gets away, but it is with a heavy heart, for as he bitterly reflects upon the sorry affair, the vision of Heloise united to her soldier lover rises tauntingly before him.

MANON. Lescaut, a soldier, who is a rollicking good fellow, fond of his glass, receives from his father a message that his sister Manon will arrive in Paris the following day, and requests him to meet her and look after her welfare. In the midst of a round of gaiety Lescaut fails to meet her, and she, arriving without friends, is at a loss what to do, until Des Grieux comes forward and offers to be her escort. They fall violently in love with one another, and it is not until some days later that she meets her brother when promenading in the fashionable Place Vendome. A marquis, the friend of her brother, is introduced and he in turn also falls deeply in love with her. This marquis is a man of great power, and her brother's patron, and in order to remove her from the influence of Des Grieux he has the latter kidnapped and placed in a monastery. Manon then, fickle as all women, agrees to marry the marquis. Meantime Des Grieux has taken holy orders, and Manon, reading one day that he is to deliver his first sermon at St. Peter's attends, and afterward congratulates him in the vestry. Their old love refuses to be smothered, and the marquis finding them together uses his influence and has Manon deported.

AN AWFUL SYMPHONY.—A nondescript band stands in the street giving vent to the most unearthly row. Deafened by the discordant noise the inhabitants around throw water over the musicians, who immediately dissolve and disappear. Suddenly huge humid spots appear on the wall, take the shapes of the musicians, form into solid bodies, and once again the musicians recommence that awful refrain. Marching further along the street they seize some gaudy colored umbrellas. After a number of startling changes, in which the umbrellas take the leading part with very beautiful effect, the musicians return to their shanty and continue to play their awful tune.

A MAD DOG SCARE.—Josiah Brown and a few of the small town lights are seated in front of the village grocery arguing the merits and demerits of the present Congress when their attention is called to an article in the "Weekly Bugle," just published, warning the populace to beware of mad dogs. Each of the four remembers seeing the dogs in question and begins to feel shaky. A city slap, a drummer from the East, who had arrived the night before, sees an opportunity to wake up Sleepy Hollow and at the expense of the superstitions of the cornerg rocery clientele. Accordingly he enlists the services of the tomp pump comedian and they tie tin cans to the two most ferocious-looking dogs in the village, who at once start on a rampage, running over people and creating more excitement than a circus parade in Mudville. Josiah, big and fat, was a special mark for the frenzied dog, and in the excitement loses a half yard from his trousers. He is more than sure that he was bitten. The whole town is in a turmoil. Going home, the family fly from the house, madly, almost exhausted from excitement, he is roped by the populace and tied on a chair. The town constable sets as a death watch to see that he does not chew the ropes off. The dog is killed and stepped for examination. Three days later a telegram is received that the dog had no hydrophobia, but was only suffering from a case of fleas. Josiah is released amid general rejoicing and returns to the fond embraces of his family.

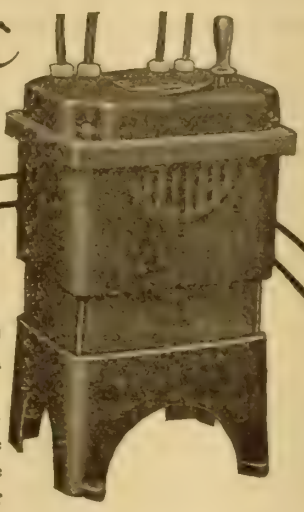
COMPENSARC
This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

ATLAS.

THE PROSPECTOR'S TREASURE.—A forty niner makes a strike, cleans up sufficient gold dust and leaves his claim for the nearest settlement to obtain necessary supplies. During the trip he is surprised and attacked by Indians. During the scrimmage the prospector is killed, but before being mortally wounded he hides his treasure in the hollow of a tree, unobserved by the Indians.

Sixty years later, a well cultivated farm is situated on the scene of the prospector's death. Farmer Jones, the owner of the farm, has been obliged to mortgage it and is unable to liquidate the debt. Banker Sharp, an aged country financier, offers to cancel the mortgage provided Mabel Smith, the farmer's daughter, will become his wife. The father protests and asks for time to raise the money, but Mabel, not wishing to have her father deprived of the fruits of his years of hard labor and turned out of house and home in his old age, agrees to the proposal of Banker Sharp.

Mabel has been courted by Frank Strong, and they had hoped to wed, but Mabel explains to Frank that her first duty is to her father, and on the day of her wedding, the final parting of the lovers takes place beneath the old oak tree in which the prospector hid his gold dust, sixty years ago.

Mabel tells Frank that she has written him a letter which she placed in the hole of the old oak, and which he is to read after they have parted.

Frank, following instructions, looks for the letter and finds the prospector's gold dust which has been concealed in the old oak for sixty years.

Frank in haste takes his find to the farmer and explains that it belongs to him, as it was found on his property. The farmer realizes that he is now in a position to pay off the mortgage and prevent his daughter's sacrifice, and as the minister is on hand to marry Mabel to the old banker, he insists that Mabel and Frank be wedded at once. The consternation of Banker Sharp, who arrives to find that his prospective bride is the wife of another, and the fact that Farmer Jones is in a position to pay off the mortgage, is left to the imagination.

CHAMPION.

A ROMANCE OF AN ANVIL.—A will provides that Grace marry young Carson, so that they both inherit great riches. Should she refuse, he is cut off; but should she die without being married, he gets the estate.

He sets out to treacherously bring about her demise. He bribes a blacksmith's helper to meddle with the shoe of her saddle horse, then causes the horse to run away. Not only is he unsuccessful, but the hired man goes back on him, as is usual. Seeing that the helper cannot be driven from a course of blackmail, he murders him and tries to lay the crime on the blacksmith; and he would succeed, too, had it not been for a little girl who was picking flowers near the scene of Carson's crime, and now comes forward to tell what she saw.

Needless to say Carson gets his deserts, while Grace and the "brawny young smithy" are started on their world of happiness.

ECLAIR.

THE SILVERSMITH TO KING LOUIS XI.—John d'Estorreville is in love with the beautiful Marie de St. Vallier, goddaughter of the King. Owing to their different stations, the young lovers find it difficult to see each other. John, however, manages to send a note to the Princess Marie, naming a rendezvous for the coming evening. The lovers meet and John gleefully discloses a plan whereby they will in future be able to see more of each other and enjoy each other's society. The plan is carried out. John, disguised and well supplied with excellent recommendations, applies for the position of apprentice to the silversmith to King Louis XI., and is accepted.

John is shown in his room, in the attic of the King's palace, and is locked in, according to the custom, in order that he might not be tempted to tamper with the treasure in charge of his master, the silversmith. As soon as all is still in the palace, John arises, forces open the door of his room and climbing out of a turret window, lowers himself by means of a rope to the window of his beloved. The princess is almost overcome with fright at the danger her lover has faced in order to reach her side, but she soon recovers and welcomes him with great joy.

Meanwhile the silversmith, who is a victim of somnambulism, steals and hides his own treasure. When he discovers his loss the next morning, he immediately suspects the apprentice, and calling some of the retinue of the palace he proceeds to the boy's chamber. Finding the door broken open, their suspicions are confirmed and they accuse the youth. John is about to deny the charge when it flashes across his mind that by doing so he would compromise his sweetheart, and so for her sake, he pleads guilty to the accusation. He is immediately taken out to be hanged by order of the King.

Marie has heard of her lover's danger and immediately resolves to save him; she, therefore, rushes to the spot selected for the execution and confesses her love for John, thus proving an alibi. The King delays the execution and begins an investigation, and after setting watch discovers the real robber of the treasure, and John is pardoned. The King, in his royal justice, gives him the hand of his goddaughter, the Princess Marie, but in order to punish John for his escapade declares that the marriage shall not take place until the expiration of one year!

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE PRODIGAL SON.—A shoemaker and his wife, a most thrifty couple, have one aim in life, and that is to give their two children, Helen and Gus, a good education. Helen, a very pretty girl, is much loved and admired by a young fellow, Howard, who keeps a small grocery store next door, but his love is not returned. Gus has lately developed into a rather careless fellow, and is always found in bad company and spending his money extravagantly. He has run into debt, and is in such straits that he is tempted to steal a bicycle left standing in the street. This he pawns, but is found out and is arrested in his father's house. His son's plight is such a blow to the father that he dies broken hearted. Howard is at this time a great relief to the old mother and her daughter, and after some time, the daughter accepts him as her husband. The three live happily together until one day Gus, released from prison, returns home. Instead of commencing a new life, he continues to be reckless. One night he plans with two accomplices to break into the grocery store, not knowing that it belongs to his brother-in-law. While in the house, the light from his lantern falls on the furniture, which all seems familiar to him. He sees a photo on the table which he recognizes as that of his mother. This so surprises him that he drops his lantern and attempts to run out of the house, but is confronted by his sister, who recognizes her brother in the burglar. She calls her husband who generously offers to let Gus go, but it is too late as the police have already appeared. The old mother has to see the prisoners for the purpose of identification, and the meeting with her son under these circumstances leaves a deep impression on Gus. He is convicted, but after again serving some time in prison, he is entirely changed. He appeals to the society for the support of released convicts, and they assist him with money to pay his way to a foreign country, accompanied with good wishes for the new life he is going to begin.

"IMP."

TWO MAIDS.—Two pretty, witty, mischievous girls pay a visit to a married friend of theirs, whom they haven't seen in a long time. They happen to arrive at their friend's house within a few minutes after her serving maids have left her service. The long lapse of time has made the girls unrecognizable to their friend, and perceiving the situation, they conceive the novel idea of applying for the positions. They are hired on the spot, and at once don the traditional white apron and cap, and set about their unfamiliar tasks. There are blunders and mishaps galore, and the girls alternately smile and frown at the queer duties they are assigned.

Night and three men enter. The husband of the girls' friend has brought a couple of friends home to dinner no other than the fiances of the frolicsome damsels. In setting the table, the girls see the men and hear a hasty and ingle to retreat to their room. The dinner bell rings, first pleadingly, then threateningly, and soon becomes a stentorian clarion of sound, but the girls ignore the summons command, and an investigation by the household succeeds in solving the extraordinary puzzle and everything is straightened out with many smiles and much handshaking also some kissing.

BEAR YE ONE ANOTHER'S BURDENS.—Grover Rand is overcome by a stroke of paralysis in the office of his broker, and after being brought around goes to his home, where he has a second attack, after which he is practically helpless. He is unable even to move about, and his wife decides to take over his business cares and resources. She goes to his broker with certain bonds to arrange a business transaction, but the broker makes it appear that the papers are worthless. Convinced that their fortune is swept away, saddened at the prospect of a bleak and destitute future, but determined to keep the information from her husband, she returns to her home. Soon they are reduced to straightened circumstances, and the wife establishes a little workroom adjacent to the one in which the invalid is confined, and which is so carefully screened from his view that he cannot see the misery and squalor so near to the garnished and gilded trimmings of his own room. When near and about him, Mrs. Rand wears the costly clothes of former days, but in her own little workshop she is content with the cheapest, most coarse apparel, which she keeps in a trunk in the room.

Then it happens. One night the child—their child, of whom much is not seen heretofore—reaches out a little baby hand from under the bed-cover, stretches it far and still a little further, until it comes in contact with the cover on a near-by table, and with a little, sturdy tug, the cover is off the table, and the lamp off the cover and on the floor. Rand sees the danger, but is unable to check the child.

Soon the room is ablaze, and the flame is crawling and creeping. Rand realizes that the lives of [illegible] child and himself are imperiled and the knowledge acts like an electric shock upon his enfeebled limbs. The dormant strength of [illegible] responds strongly to the fear, the sluggish blood pulsates and tingles through his veins, and with a supreme effort he springs up. The last of his newly found strength for a moment staggers him, but the next second he has the child in his arms and is carrying it to safety. He then returns and fights the flames, and after strenuous labor extinguishes them. Then for the first time in long, dreary months he looks about the apartment, explores nooks and corners, opens doors and closets, and discovers the little sewing room, with its gown, under base. He sees the shabby clothing, concealed from him to spare him the pang and heartache of their misery. His wife's sacrifice dawns upon him, and he sobs in the way that strong men do.

The last chapter is reunion and a new incarnation.

MA'S NEW DOG.—Willy Fitzgibbons is hanging his hat up at the house of the highly respectable family of the Tomkinses and he is directing all the force of his undying love upon Henrietta, the pretty daughter of Pa Tomkins. Ma Tomkins, upon inquiring into the prospects of Mr. William Fitzgibbons, does not think him capable of supporting a wife and her family, not to mention his own, so does all she can to put a stop to the proceedings. The old lady unfortunately dozes in the afternoon and leaves the way clear to the lovers and for the time being the course of true love acts contrary to its proverbial manner of procedure. But alas and alack, Ma wakes to find the willful maid in the arms of her woeful lover and he is soon the target of unkind remarks upon the part of dear Ma. Consequently he goes mareening home minus his sweetheart. Love laughs at locksmiths and soon Willy discovers that Ma wants a bow-wow and he determines to disguise himself as the article in demand. Shortly after a very large and well groomed poodle puts in appearance at the house of the respectable family before mentioned and is installed in due course. Ma takes a violent fancy to the lovely creature and after an adventure with Fitz she determines that the pooch she sees of some people the name so Flies her dog. This is rather annoying to Fitz who wants to spend some time alone of other coach so, so he determines to pretend that he is one. Ma is glad to escape from the velvet animal and [illegible] leaves the lovers alone to the happy consolation. The feelings of Mrs. Tomkins can better be imagined than described when she [illegible] to find her daughter in the arms of a mad dog. Explanations are soon forthcoming and [illegible] is over the lovers quite [illegible] Willy proposes to her a good [illegible] to take the place of the departed hound.

John Halton, Alice's father a man of fiery temperament, is fairly beside himself with rage and all because the surveyors have found that twenty feet of his land should be turned over to his old-time friend and neighbor, Major Baker. Surveyors or no surveyors, how dare he claim the land which had not only been his, but his father's and his father's father before him? Therefore, he angrily informs the crusty old Major that if he relinquished one foot of land it would be over his dead body. The controversy waxes hot, words fly thick and fast, until Halton gives his neighbor a vigorous whack with his cane. This proves too much for the Major, who instantly whips out his gun, and it is only the prompt interference of the surveyors and old Joe which keeps the two from wounding and perhaps killing each other then and there. They are led away—it is the beginning of a mountain feud.

Ned is struck dumb with amazement when, upon bringing the girl home, her father and brother pounce upon and securely bind him. As is the custom in all such feuds, Halton declares that the entire family of his enemy must be wiped out, and prepares to kill Ned. Neither the tears nor the entreaties of Mrs. Halton and Alice can move him from his determination, but, luckily for all concerned, as Lou Halton throws his sister from in front of the prisoner, she knocks her father's gun to the ground; quick as a flash her mother picks it up and tosses it into the well. However, the enraged old man does not intend to be deprived of his prey, and forthwith sends his son to borrow another gun. Alice manages to slip away in the excitement and rushes to the Baker home, where she finds the Major armed to the teeth and about to call on her father. She gasps out the information of his son's immediate danger, and he feverishly puts into execution the girl's daring plan to save the young man, which is to send a note to her father, declaring that the Bakers had caught and bound her and that she would be killed at the first sound of firing. Old Joe, realizing his mission, runs as though bent on breaking all running records, and reaches the place just as Lou is handing the borrowed gun to his father. With the aid of a spyglass the note's contents are quickly confirmed—Alice can be plainly seen, bound to the porch with the Major's gun coolly pointed at her breast. But the Haltons, father and son, have not seen how careful the Major was in removing the cartridges from the gun. Then they run to the girl's rescue, leaving Ned to be untied by Mrs. Halton and old Joe, and then all three hasten to the Baker home.

While the fight is still on, the surveyors put in an appearance and assure the two wrangling families that an error has been made, for the old survey has proven right after all. Great is the rejoicing as the two old men, pleased yet half ashamed, are finally induced to clasp hands. Alice and Ned fall into each other's arms and vow to marry at once. Everybody is happy, but none more so than faithful old Joe.

A MESSAGE OF THE SEA.—Wouldn't you be delighted, excited and carried beyond yourself, were you seated on a beach, and a bottle, containing the facts regarding a buried treasure, was washed up from the sea and at your very feet? Helen was all this, and lost no time in running home to tell her father of the glad tidings. He, in company with Capt. Elliott and Mr. Crane, and, of course, his daughter, start off to seek the treasure. They reach their destination and set camp. The father goes in one direction to locate the wealth and Crane takes that chance to make love to Helen; the Captain unintentionally interrupts his most ardent pleadings. Helen and Crane also go their way, while Elliott starts off alone. He is the lucky man, but will let no one but Helen touch the find. The Captain ignores Crane's advances and gains his dislike for that and because of his ill-success with Helen, who shows a marked preference for the Captain. Helen runs after Elliott to say good-night, but it ripens into a love scene; and at the camp Crane is busy having the treasure chest removed from Helen's tent. Just as the unwilling sailors are about to put it on a boat, Helen stops them, and the Captain comes to her aid. He settles with Crane and the chest is taken back. Elliott and Helen engage in rapturous love-making, to the father's approval and amusement and to Crane's disgust.

BLACK PETE'S REFORMATION.—Julia, the hermit's daughter, finds him scanning his gold; and shortly after he shows her its hiding place, he passes away, leaving her alone in the wilderness. Black Pete, a bandit, holds up a stage coach and relieves the passengers of their valuables, which he loads upon his horse and starts away. He is shot at, however, wounded, and later has the good fortune to come to the shelter of Julia's rough home. To her he confesses his guilt, and after seeing that he is comfortable, she takes his laden mount and goes away. The passengers of the coach, when they arrive at their destination, tell of the outrage committed, and the Sheriff, with cowboys, goes in pursuit of the bandit. Imagine their astonishment when they see the horse standing in the roadway with all the stolen goods upon him. The Sheriff leads it away and Julia comes from her hiding place, well satisfied that that misdeed is rectified. She returns to her home and again attends to Black Pete's wants. He asks her to join her lot with his, and, while she shows amazement, does not repulse her suitor. She finally decides to accept his offer and shows Black Pete the hidden gold, which she gives him. Together they go to her father's grave and here she prays. Black Pete joins in with her and promises to always care for Julia. From the grave they go to the church, where they are married, and then return to their humble, happy home. Black Pete's Reformation is a good moral lesson no one is beyond redemption.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

COHEN & MURPHY. Jake Cohen and John Murphy are proprietors of the Palace Hotel in Muttown, Arizona. Though continually quarrelling, they are devoted friends. "Red" Carney, a real "bad man," whose sweetheart is a waitress in the hotel, comes over drunk and starts to "shoot up" the place. Murphy is shot and dies. Cohen offers a large reward for the capture of Carney, but nobody can be persuaded to go after the bad man. Later, Cohen takes from the girl a letter from Carney in which he reveals his whereabouts. Cohen offers the cowboys a thousand dollars if they will go after Carney, but they all refuse. Then Cohen resolves to capture the bad man himself. He provides himself with a bottle of whiskey, goes to Carney's cabin in the mountains, and hides himself under the bed until Carney is dead drunk; and then Cohen comes out, ties Carney, puts him on a wagon and carries him back to town. The crowd cheer Cohen and he presents them with a large, long rope. The boys take the hint and Carney is taken out to suffer his just deserts.

OUR HOUSEMAID.—Katie, the housemaid, is playing on the piano in the parlor when she hears someone coming. She hides under the sofa. An old maid and the minister enter, sit on the sofa and begin to make love. Katie upsets the sofa with screamingly funny results.

A sleepy boarder leaves word to be awakened early. Katie shakes him, slaps him and finally pulls him out of bed.

A dude boarder is about to take a bath. He sends Katie for towels, then sits on the tub fully dressed. Katie enters hurriedly and the dude gets his bath with his clothes on, and Katie gets all that is coming to her.

The cook slaps Katie, who, to get even, pours kerosene into the soup. The boarders are all made sick, and the cook answers their complaints by "rough-housing" the dining room, upsetting the table and everybody in the place.

The cook enters the kitchen and finds Katie tasting some cornstarch pudding. With a yell of rage the cook shoves Katie's head into the pudding, and the finish is a scream.

THE MISSING BRIDEGROOM.—Roberts is in love with Clarice Moulton. George Stamford meets Clarice and wins her love. When Roberts learns of their engagement he decides to avenge himself, and he does so in a dastardly manner.

It is the day of the wedding of Clarice and Stamford. The bride is ready, and the guests are assembled, but the bridegroom does not appear. We see Roberts and his valet enter Stamford's room, chloroform him and take him out. They take him to Robert's roomy old mansion in the suburbs and chain him up to the wall in the cellar. The bridal party are worried over the failure of the bridegroom to appear and the girl's father goes to his room to look for him, but he can learn nothing of Stamford's whereabouts.

The next day Stamford unmasks his captor, who has come to gloat over his misery. Months pass. The girl, believing that Stamford has willfully deserted her, accepts her first lover, Roberts.

Meanwhile we see the wretched lover making heroic efforts to escape from the vile dungeon where he is confined. Gradually he wears away a link in the chain. It breaks and releases him. After a terrific fight with his jailer, the valet, Stamford escapes and goes back to the city. Ragged and dirty, he rushes to the home of his sweetheart, where he learns that she has gone to the church to be married to Roberts. He dashes into the church followed by a policeman. The minister is about to pronounce the words that make Roberts the husband of Clarice, when Stamford dashes in and protests against the marriage. He denounces Roberts; but all think that the dirty, ragged man is a madman until he tells his story. Roberts is taken away by the policeman and Clarice takes Stamford in her arms.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

THE GIRLS OF THE GHETTO.—Bella is an emigrant girl doing sweatshop work in the Ghetto of a great city. By saving for some time, she manages to get together enough money to send to the old country for her two little sisters. She meets them at Ellis Island and escorts them across Battery Park to their new home. The three girls live with an uncle and aunt in one poor room in a tenement.

The smallest of the sisters while playing on the sidewalk one day, gets lost and suddenly finds herself in Chinatown. She is dismayed at the entirely strange surroundings, and is weeping bitterly when found by John Magie, a young settlement worker. He dries her tears and takes her safely to her sweatshop home.

John is at once attracted by Bella, whom he meets for the first time when he brings the little one back. He does the family many little kindnesses, bringing them flowers and books, and induces the girls to attend the classes at the settlement.

While teaching his class one evening, John is suddenly attacked with a fever, which is epidemic at that time. All his pupils flee from him in fear, except Bella, who remains and nurses him back to health.

Upon his recovery John makes Bella his wife and they take up together the work of bringing knowledge and happiness to the poor of the East Side.

THE PLAYWRIGHT'S LOVE. John Russell, an unsuccessful playwright, is in straightened circumstances, but is generous despite his poverty. When a poor woman falls exhausted at his doorway he takes her in, and after her death he cares for her child. This kind action seems to bring him luck, for a play that he had been unable to dispose of is sold for a good sum and he starts on the high road to prosperity.

Ten years later when the girl has grown to womanhood, John finds that he is deeply in love with his ward, but does not betray his passion, believing that it is hopeless. His eyes are opened, however, by Will, who is in love with Grace, and is told by her when she refuses him that she loves John. When John hears this he promptly proposes and is as promptly accepted by the girl.

YANKEE

THE UNGRATEFUL DAUGHTER-IN-LAW.—A well-bred young Polish Jew has followed many of his kind to the land of the brave and the home of the free.

Then, following the precepts of his forefathers, he has married and multiplied the race, which in this instance consists of a young daughter, now aged ten.

Prosperity had turned her back upon this ambitious son of Israel, and a bare existence was all that this fickle goddess of fortune allotted him.

The crisis was reached when he was thrown out of employment, without any provision being made for a rainy day. But God is good to the faithful, and when the clouds of adversity were darkest, a ray of sunshine broke through. The young Pole's mother arrived in America, bearing with her the proceeds of the sale of all her possessions in the fatherland—sufficient to assure a life of comfort to her beloved children.

Without question, the aged mother gave her all to her son and daughter-in-law, and little did she think of the consequences. The daughter-in-law—American born and without the knowledge of the duty due a parent—in the ease and affluence following their sudden good fortune forgot whence it came and to whom it was due.

The old mother was in the way, interfered with her son's wife's social aspirations, and, alas! was abused and degraded by her daughter-in-law.

What man has joined together, let no man put asunder; so, rather than come between man and wife, this grand old woman, without thought of self, leaves the comforts of a home which she in fact had established.

Selling papers, peddling and performing menial labor may provide a living for the young and strong, but the load was too heavy for this Spartan mother.

That she was saved from a watery grave she does not now regret, for being restored to the arms of her son and his repentant wife and with a loving grandchild to attend her every wish, the memory of the past seems but a dream.

NOTES FROM THE MANUFACTURERS

ESSANAY NOTES.

The publicity department of the Essanay Company has issued its mid-Summer edition of The Essanay Guide and it is a creditable number. It is an artistic little booklet of some twenty four pages and contains, besides its regular film descriptions, a number of newsy articles, which should prove of live interest to exhibitors.

The Bulletin contains an illustrated article on the Essanay Stock Company in the West, an article concerning the leading people of the Essanay's Chicago studios, under the heading "Essanay Personalities," a story of the moving picture end of the Jeffries-Johnson fight, and the announcement article about the Essanay's $100 name contest. The book is artistically illustrated, with attractive headings and borders.

The Essanay Guide is now mailed to about 8,500 exhibitors in America, while a large number are shipped to the London office of the company. The Essanay Company expresses the hope that if any exhibitor has been overlooked he will inform the company's publicity department and his name will be placed on the Guide mailing list.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

The "Thanhouser Kid" appears in both of next week's Thanhouser releases, viz., "The Girls of the Ghetto," issued Tuesday, July 19, and "The Playwright's Love," issued Friday, July 22. In the Ghetto subject she plays the part of an emigrant child and in "The Playwright's Love" she portrays for a time the orphan whom the playwright adopts.

"The Girls of the Ghetto" is a study of settlement conditions in the great East Side of New York City. It was produced right in the heart of the Ghetto to insure a faithful presentation of East Side localities and life. Representatives of all races and nationalities pass through the picture, from the slow-stepping Russian to the gliding Chinee.

A fair idea of the vicissitudes of the aspiring playwright may be gained from "The Playwright's Love," the Friday release, where the troubles of John Russell, would be dramatist, are pictured. But his troubles are merely incidental to the love affair in which he figures and of which the picture mainly treats.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Vitagraph studio is a hot place, but they always take it cool and never get excited down there; that is the reason they are turning out some hot stuff. Fine photographic weather this, and they are making the best of it, nothing but the best of it. Just at present they hand you one on the 19th of July entitled "Two Hieland Lads." The "lads" are a breezy pair and make you forget all about the weather and everything else.

It's easy sailing when you go along with the tide and the wind and there's nothing that dances over the rippling waves of laughter so easily as "Davy Jones and Captain Bragg" starting on its voyage July 22. Both "Davy" and the "Captain" run afoul, but Davy tacks to the windward. The Captain loses his head, deserts his smack and Davy triumphantly wins the prize. It's a comical contagious comedy; it's a regular side-shaker and makes your timbers shiver from keel to mast. "Davy Jones" is a gay old sea dog, "deevil among the weemin," and a whole comic supplement of fun. From the funny to the serious is but one day, Saturday, July 23, when "Hako's Sacrifice" is offered. A Japanese drama of Eastern splendor with a beautiful story of self-sacrifice, gratitude and love. Those who remember "The Love of Chrysanthemum" and "Ito, the Beggar Boy," will appreciate the richness of scenery and the beautiful tale of "Hako's Sacrifice."

And still they come! Nothing succeeds like success and the Vitagraph gets them going and coming:

Chattanooga, Tenn., July 4, 1910.

Gentlemen: Of all the pictures I have ever seen "Old Glory" is certainly the cream of them all. Never heard such outbursts of enthusiasm in a motion picture theater as we received at every showing of the beautiful, elaborate pictures. Enough could not be said about photography, but how could it be otherwise than perfect? It was a Vitagraph production. Wishing you continued success,

JOHN B. McDOUGAL, Mgr. Bonita Theater.

Chicago, Ill., June 27, 1910.

Dear Sirs: I wish to write just a few lines of congratulations from myself and in behalf of my managers. I own four theaters, the smallest seats 400 and the largest 900. These are all picture theaters absolutely and in all I use "first run." I am in the theatrical business and holder of stock in film exchanges and have watched with keen interest the rapid improvements in films. For a long time Vitagraph films were just one of many producers, but in the last six months you are rapidly gaining the front and you certainly deserve it. Our public lately demands Vitagraph films and that recommends the glorious work you are doing. Keep the good thing up.

A. M. GOLLOS.

LUBIN NOTES.

Several strong comedies are among the early releases of the Lubin Company. One of these is a Western comedy that sounds a new note, and another, even funnier, deals with a man who refuses to take his wife around with him because she is no sport. There is a life and dash to the Lubin comedies that keeps them in demand.

Another interesting release pending is an Indian story written by a former Indian agent who knows the red man intimately, and another strong story by a well-known magazine writer will be presented early in August.

Last week three of the Lubin directors were working in the new studio at the same time, employing from three to five sets each, and yet there was plenty of room to spare under the big glass roof. The spacious studio greatly facilitates production and at the same time the new work is even better from a photographic point of view than the recent splendid productions.

Something of a record was made the other day when one of the Lubin players suggested the plot for a comedy story about noon. The idea was developed and the first scenes made within two hours. It was intended to make it a short release but it worked out so well that it will appear as a full reel comedy crowded with fun.

"The Stepdaughter" and "Wifie's Mamma" are the Lubin releases for the week of July 25. "The Stepdaughter" being released on that date and the comedy on the 28th. Like all the Lubin comedies, this mother-in-law story has a distinct touch of originality, for, after doing his best to drive his wife's mother away by such devices as scuttling the boat in which he takes her rowing, the husband learns that she wanted to go home but was staying on because he tried too hard to entertain her. It gives new humor to the mother-in-law idea.

CHAMPION FILM COMPANY.

THE COWBOY AND THE SQUAW. "The Cowboy and the Squaw" tells a breezy Western story full of wholesome heart interest, showing the rough, manly cowboys performing deeds of heroism that will thrill you and make the blood leap faster through your veins. The story opens with the Sheriff posting a reward for the capture of Jake Simmons, a rustler and all round bad man. Jake happens to be in the crowd, unknown to the officers. Mary Loring, a product of the West, rides along and Jake, who is in love with her, presses his suit. Mary is in love with Jim Durkin, a manly young cowboy on a neighboring ranch. As Jake presses his suit Jim rides up and he and Mary ride off together. Wild with rage Jake swears revenge on both of them and he, with a couple of his band, lie in wait for Mary to make her a prisoner. Mary is captured but manages to dash away, but Jake gallops madly after her and when he gets abreast of her picks her bodily out of her saddle, galloping at full speed, swings his horse around and gallops to his hiding place. Red Wing, an Indian squaw, who is a great friend of Jim Durkins, on account of Jim having once saved her life, sees signs of Mary's struggle on the ground and rides for Jim, tells him what she saw and they gallop in pursuit. When Jim and Red Wing come upon Jake and his gang, Jake points a revolver at Mary's head and tells Jim he will shoot if he comes a step nearer. Jim, in deathly fear for his sweetheart's safety, offers himself a prisoner in exchange for her freedom. Jake accepts the exchange—and taking Jim further into the foothills, ties him to a wild broncho and sends him galloping to his death. But Red Wing, the faithful friend, sticks on Jim's trail, sends for the posse, and when Jim is galloping to his death, Red Wing gives pursuit and after a mad ride rescues him by cutting the ropes and he falls to the ground unhurt. Jim then mounts Red Wing's pony with her and they both dash back to Jake's camp. Jim fights a duel, with bowie knives, with Jake and conquers him as the Sheriff's posse arrives and takes him a prisoner.—1,000 feet.

HOW TO INCREASE YOUR BOX OFFICE RECEIPTS—PLEASE YOUR PATRONS

Human Life Photography

Patent Mirror Screen came in good shape. I would not take $1,000.00 for it if I could not buy another. I have opposition, but the Mirror Screen makes his picture look like 30 cents.
Very truly,
S. G. SMITH, New Lexington, Ohio.

How is it all done? The MIRROR SCREEN IS THE ANSWER. It ReflectS, MagnifieS, TransmitS and IntensifieS ExpressioN, BringS PictureS to LifE.

Many cities have taken up this question—"How Can the Picture Theatres Be Better Lighted"? For moral reasons we demand light during performances. The MIRROR SCREEN is the solution of this well taken reform.

A Busted Promise

A couple of weeks ago we promised to submit proof showing that the moving picture trust is trying to ruin the business of certain exhibitors who refuse to charge ten cents instead of five cents admission to their theatres. We failed to get the proof in the time we expected, but we'll get it yet! In fact we are going to "show up" every move the trust makes till we compel every blessed one of you to realize that ALL your safety lies in immediate and true Independence. We are giving the most wonderful film service you ever dreamed of. Every day you fail to get it you are holding back your own progress in the film exhibition business. Write at once.

NESTOR FILMS

"Rarely Equalled—Never Surpassed"

RELEASED WEDNESDAY
JULY 20th, 1910

Back in the Mountains

A thrilling drama overflowing with heart-gripping thrills. (Length, 985 Feet)

This is a tingling romance of the Blue Grass country, handled, acted and photographed with true NESTOR perfection.

A mistake in the survey of land causes two life-long friends to come to blows. A bitter feudal war begins, and, as usual, innocent ones suffer. A young man and his sweetheart, children of the feudists, are separated. The girl's father captures the young man and is about to shoot him, when her ingenuity saves him. Here unfolds a most unique twist, and, thanks to the girl's stratagem, she gets back her lover and the old-time friends become more friendly than ever.

We abstain from saying more, for SEEING IS BELIEVING. Get it; show it, and reap the benefit.

One of the many scenes from "Back in the Mountains"

SPECIAL NOTICE TO EXHIBITORS

There is a silly story going around to the effect that we are making only ONE release a week. The rumor is thoroughly false, as anyone who has been watching our work knows. We release a "Thanhouser" every Tuesday and Friday. The two "Thanhousers" that are released every week are essential to the success of your business. You know this to be so.

Make your exchange give you both of 'em. Certainly, trade doesn't come so easily in Summer that you can afford to miss a single "Thanhouser" THAT REALLY IS RELEASED AND REALLY IS OBTAINABLE. The next time you're told we make but ONE release a week, tell the teller to GUESS AGAIN. We're right on the job with TWO, and if you don't get 'em it's your own fault.

RATIFIED!
ENDORSED!
—AND—RECOMMENDED

AT NIAGARA FALLS, in Convention assembled, the National Independent Moving Picture Allianec went on record as being heartily in acccord with all the plans, purposes and policies of the Sales Company.

The original Chicago agreement was UNANIMOUSLY RATIFIED, thus insuring the exhibitor a backing that is thoroughly solid and harmonious, with every vestige of factional feeling entirely eradicated.

CO-OPERATION is the keynote of the Independent forces today, and all of its combined strength will be concentrated toward one great object—the improvement of the now excellent quality of its combined program.

We invite exhibitors to write us on any matter in which a tribunal of manufacturers and exchange men can be of any service. We want to help you to a better enjoyment and appreciation of our big program; look it over:—EVERY MONDAY.

"LOVE IN MEXICO"

The plot of this "Bison" Film story is most unique. It shows how Jacques, a wealthy Mexican, who, after turning over gold for the hand of a poor man's daughter, is foiled; only to find that Luzetta has made her escape to the woods where she discovers her former lover Petro. An exciting struggle takes place between the old man and the Mexican and it is only the intervention of Petro that saves the father from harm. In every particular this film is up to the standard of photographic excellence set by the New York Motion Picture Company.

"IN THE WILD WEST"

A stirring story of primitive life in the wild west, showing an attack made by four robbers who successfully hold up a stage coach and take possession of a cash box, together with the passenger's valuables. The driver escapes and goes directly to the town Sheriff's office for aid. Later we see the Sheriff and a band of cowboys in pursuit of the robbers, who are trailed and cornered on the edge of a steep mountain. A lively conflict ensues and the robbers are eventually overcome and relieved of their ill-gotten goods. Acting, riding and the photographic quality of this subject cannot be excelled.

HALLBERG MOVES TO

36 East 23d Street

Directly Opposite Metropolitan Tower

MR. MANAGER AND MR. OPERATOR:

I have long felt that the location which I have heretofore occupied has been somewhat inaccessible, especially to the New York manager and operator who visit the regular film and moving picture district in New York City.

The phenominal success which I have had in the sale of "HALLBERG" goods for moving picture and other theatres has made it necessary for me to carry larger stock and to cater to the retail trade, therefore, I have taken a long lease of the fourth floor of No. 36 East 23d St., which is a modern fireproof office building with ample freight and passenger elevator service, located directly opposite the Metropolitan Tower, just a few minutes' walk from the Flatiron Bldg., and from all the uptown and downtown Subway, Elevated and Surface lines, and, as you know, the 23d St. Crosstown line passes my entrance.

I am within walking distance of all of the important film exchanges, and my new show room will be the most modern and best equipped in Greater New York.

I invite you to call any time after August 1st, 1910, when I expect to be be settled in my new quarters.

I have selected the best goods on the market for you, and can fit you out with complete electric machine and ventilating equipment, and results are positively guaranteed.

??WHY IS IT??

That the Motiograph Factory, even with largely increased facilities, is working to almost the Limit of it's Capacity, in the month of July with only a single sample No 1—A machine on hand ahead of orders, and no present prospect of the usual mid summer vacation and no Special Inducements having been made the user to stimulate the sales. (The above is neither idle talk or bluff, but facts that are open to challange.) The answer is

THERE'S A LOT OF REASONS

THE MOST IMPORTANT OF WHICH ARE

BRIGHTER PICTURES
FLICKERLESS PICTURES } BECAUSE of the Patented Double Cone Shutter. No other machine has it.

GREATER DURABILITY PROVEN by three years of continuous heavy grind in Electric Theatres, the very little attention required and very small repair bills.

IT IS A SIMPLE MACHINE, BECAUSE it has no complicated parts and all parts are astonishingly easy and quick to get at.

IT HAS THE ONLY SATISFACTORY SAFETY FIRE PROOF SHUTTER

IT NEVER FAILS. OTHERS DO.

THE PATENT QUICK REWIND. Rewinds the film from the main crank handle in ONE AND A HALF minutes.

THE STAR AND CAM RUN IN OIL and are protected from dirt, dust and grit.

THE QUICK TAKE-DOWN is a 1910 FEATURE of great convenience to the operator. Take mechanism apart and put it together in a few minutes with no tools except a screw driver.

These are only a few of the many reasons. The catalogue and users of the Motiograph tell the rest.

PETTENGILL & PETTENGILL of Eureka, Cal., July 5, 1910, say—"We think the No. 1 A is far better than the 1909, and we thought it perfect. We are Motiograph enthusiasts and this is the third Motiograph, having purchased the first one in 1908."

W. H. JOHNSON of Kalamazoo, Mich., July 11, 1910, says—"Have had but one extra set of sprocket wheels for Motiograph in three years. Run twenty shows a day. Motiograph practically good as new."

ROY MONAGHAN, Operator of the Star Theatre, Manistique, Mich., July 10, 1910, says—"Motiograph been running sixteen months without a single repair part, which I think is a credit to the makers."

A Big Circuit, now using six Motiographs, part of them two years, say they will throw out two more machines and install Motiographs.

If you know the Motiograph, you'll never be satisfied with any other. Send for 1910 catalogue.

Copyright and the Picture.

Last year we drew particular attention to the fact that a new copyright law had come into force in the United States. Since we wrote about the matter, the number of manufacturers of moving pictures in this country has more than doubled, and inferentially the number of those who prepare the scenarios for those manufacturers has largely increased. Indeed, the entire producing part of the business has expanded to such a great extent these last twelve months, that this question of copyright assumes relatively very great importance indeed.

It would be well, therefore, if we reiterated the fact that from the Government Printing Office at Washington, a copy of this act can be obtained in which the law, as regards copyright, is very clearly set forth. Section 5 of the act specifies the classes of work for which protection by registration can be obtained. These include books, periodicals, lectures, dramatic compositions, musical compositions, works of art, drawings, prints, photographs, etc., and it behooves scenario writers, manufacturers, producers—we might also include exhibitors—to be aware of the fact that it is well within the bounds of possibility, nay, probability, that they are at times, consciously or unconsciously, infringing somebody's copyright in their pictures. Let us give a concrete illustration of the dangers which may be run in the production of moving pictures. The Paris correspondence of one of the leading New York newspapers recently contained the information that a well-known dramatist visited a moving picture show and saw in a picture a reproduction of scenes from his play. He brought action against the proprietors of the show and alternately won and lost in the courts. The Court of Cassation declared that to produce a play on the screen without the dramatist's authorization, was an infringement of copyright. The dramatist lost his case. The courts said he was mistaken, but it was claimed that although losing his case in this instance the dramatist had succeeded in gaining a victory for his profession. The judge decided that every author was entitled to protection against the reproduction of the scenes of work on the moving picture screen. The plot and its situations obviously belonged to him, as well as the dialogue, and to tell in dumb show, by means of moving pictures, a story of which he is the proprietor, would henceforth be as flagrant piracy legally as stealing the words of the play.

Though this case was fought out in the Paris courts, it is one which might and may conceivably come before the American courts. A re-perusal of the Copyright Act of the United States shows that it gives an author of a book, or a play, or a picture, just as much protection as is given in France; therefore, it behooves all American manufacturers, producers and exhibitors to take careful note of what the French judge said, and of what, in similar circumstances, an American judge may also say.

Week by week we pay special attention to the stories of the films that are printed in our columns, and to the stories of those pictures which are imported, and we are surprised at the frequency with which well-known themes are repeated and reiterated in those stories. Of two things in this connection, we are convinced of, and that is that the authors of many scenarios either knowingly or unknowingly pirate well-known situations and plots and that manufacturers either consciously or unconsciously aid and abet them in what is nothing more nor less than piracy. In other words, week by week, many valuable copyrights are knowingly or unknowingly infringed by manufacturers. Hence, manufacturers and exhibitors are running grave risk of actions for infringements.

We give an instance where we have seen on the moving picture screen reproductions of scenes and incidents from well-known books that are legally protected or copyrighted in this country. Probably the authors of these books have not thought it worth while to assert their rights, but if they did so, we have no doubt in our own mind that, where their cases are clearly put before the courts, heavy damages and penalty might be recovered. On the other hand, we know that many manufacturers when they adapt well-known books for film purposes, set themselves right in regard to copyright matters by arranging with the authors or publishers of them. As much cannot be said, we fear, with regard to the irresponsible scenario writers who furnish manufacturers with scenarios and plots. Amongst these people are many unscrupulous pirates, who do not hesitate to convey plots, situations and ideas from well-known sources. It would argue on the part of the manufacturers almost superhuman knowledge if they could always detect these piracies, so that occasionally an infringement is actually committed, although it may not evoke retaliation in form of a suit.

There is not much originality shown in moving picture scenarios, and the reasons for this are many. The best talent is not universally encouraged, and then again too much reliance is placed upon the work of the insufficiently paid hack writer. An insufficiently paid "hack" writer, in nine cases out of ten, is an unmitigated pirate, a burglar of other people's ideas. The result is melancholy mediocrity in the greater number of scenarios made use of for moving picture purposes. The uplifting of the moving picture, of which so much is written and said, will never get within measurable distance of achievement until more attention is paid to the scenario end of matters. One way of doing this is for the manufacturers, the producers, the scenario writers to respect a copyright law, not to pirate copyrighted subjects, and to encourage original talent.

A coming Thanhouser comedy, "The Mermaid," gives the graceful Miss Violet Hemming and Frank Crane an opportunity to display their physical charms and clever acting. Incidentally several other good actors are introduced and some splendid bits of photography. This week's Thanhouser drama, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," shows a notable effort to condense in one reel a classic story of great possibilities. We shall be pleased to learn how the public receive the pictured story.

Newspaper Neurasthenia.

The Jeffries-Johnson fight and the discussion it has evoked, has taught many lessons and pointed many morals. One of these is that the people of this country are, at times, as hysterical, as emotional, and as stupid, as some of the peoples of the older world,—our French cousins, to wit. The people of France go mad or stupid over the smallest provocation. It was a mixture of madness and stupidity that led to the Franco-Prussian War with all its disastrous consequences. King William of Prussia was said to have insulted a French Ambassador, whereupon the Parisian populace shouted: "A Berlin!" So for Berlin the French Army started, but they never got there and never got near it. This is a matter of history.

A black man and a white man recently stood up and hit each other in Navada, whereupon State governors, mayors, clergymen, publishers and others, including the inevitable Mr. Roosevelt, have screamed screams of horror. They have screamed so loudly that anybody would think Jeffries and Johnson were hurt. They were not. Or that anybody else, man, woman or child, in the Union was hurt. They were not. The world, and that part of it called the United States, goes on just the same as if nothing had happened at Reno. To quote from the "Ingoldsby Legends," "Nobody is one penny the worse."

But to the newspapers: Eighteen months ago we felt it our duty to lecture the press of the United States for its attitude of ignorance, prejudice, venom and misrepresentation towards the moving picture.

But that spasm of neurasthenia passed away. It passed away so completely that a few months ago in these pages we took pleasure in congratulating the press of the United States upon its sane, common-sense position towards the moving picture. In other words, the newspaper men were at last beginning to realize that the picture was a serious integer, or factor, in the entertainment of the great American people, so for a time the newspapers began to regard it as such.

Recently we have observed with regret that the ignorant lucubrations of the "cub" reporter have been allowed to appear in the columns of reputable newspapers. Although evil things have been traced to the picture, or rather have been attributed to its influence, we have not gone out of our way to take notice of these things, because we recognize them as merely sporadic. The public, generally, is getting wise to the situation, and does not believe all that the lay newspaper tells them about the moving picture. Possibly it did once, but it does not now, because the public is getting wise to what the picture really is.

But the Jeffries-Johnson episode has revived this newspaper neurasthenia in a very aggravated form. Besides the fight itself, opportunity has been taken by newspaper writers and correspondents to denounce the moving picture per se, lock, stock and barrel. Frankly, we have rubbed our eyes at reading a lot of the nonsense that has been printed. It looks to us as if it were dug up from the pages of the newspapers of two years ago. We give one specimen of the anonymous nonsense which even a reputable newspaper like the "New York Times" allows itself to print:

"No notice is taken of the many moving pictures given hourly which must have a far worse effect than any prize fight scenes, particularly in their effect on the young. In one sitting at a moving picture show the writer saw several murders with knives and an old woman portrayed as dying very distressingly of heart disease. In the consequent poverty brought on the old lady's daughter the latter took to drink very realistically. To cap the climax a young and unsuccessful musician was shown as attempting suicide by gas, stopping up the cracks with paper and so forth. At this show many children viewed these distressing and morbid spectacles, and we all know the imitative capabilities and morbid curiosity of the young.

"It would seem to a casual observer that these bloody murders, sudden deaths, and suicides must have a far worse effect on the impressionable portion of the community than the spectacle of two trained athletes engaged in a contest, which, at the best, is one of the most scientific and interesting of manly games."

The writer of this letter does not sign his name, and does not say where he saw the pictures; he simply indulges in vague, stupid generalities. We are surprised at the "New York Times" printing that letter, because in other parts of the issue in which the letter appeared, there are some sympathetic references made to the pictures as such.

Anybody would think from reading the letter we quote, that the moving picture was utilized as a means simply for exploiting brutality on the screen. Pictures such as this correspondent describes are not made now by any reputable manufacturers. It is safe to say that no reputable manufacturer or importer could exist in the business for five minutes, if he released such pictures as described above. It was the duty of the "New York Times" to rebuke its correspondent, who is guilty of arguing from the particular to the general, a common failing of the prejudiced and the bigoted.

When will the press of the United States thoroughly realize the enormous importance to the community of the moving picture, which keeps thousands and thousands of theaters open, gives employment probably to 100,000 people, amuses millions, and forms the raison d'etre of a great industry? Surely it is time that the senseless knocking of the picture which "cub" reporters, underling assistant editors and ignorant writers and correspondents of the newspapers indulge in: surely it is time that this sort of thing ceased. As a rule, newspapers are conducted by men of education and intelligence, but it really seems that when the picture comes into question they take leave of their senses and write or allow to be written the most abominable nonsense about it.

A Liar and More of His Lies.

The periodical literature of the moving picture increases and expands with its popularity. Four years ago no periodical publication, specially treating of the moving picture, was in existence. Now, throughout the world, there are probably twenty or thirty publications which take charge of the interests of the industry. In the United States there are four; in Great Britain there are two; in Paris there are one or two; Germany, two or three; Italy, one or two; Sweden, Russia, Spain, Australia each have moving picture publications. Others, no doubt, will appear in time, as the industry is bound to expand. The bibliography of the subject, that is, reputable textbooks treating of the moving picture, is, at present, not so extensive; but it may be expected in the course of time additions will be made. First of all there is Marey's classic volume on Movement. This deals with the synthesis of moving bodies, and only has an indirect bearing upon the moving picture as we see it to-day. Marey treats movement from the purely scientific standpoint. He shows how a man moves when either walking or running; how a ball drops, and the like. He analyzes movement, that is, shows how it takes place; whereas the moving picture synthesizes movement, that is to say, shows the thing in the completed form. Hopwood's book on "Living Pictures" came after Marey's. This is the most valuable book for general reference that has been published. Hopwood is, or was, an employee in the British Patent Office. His book, therefore, is stamped with authority. He traces the development of the moving picture from its beginning, gives a list of patents, and very impartially distributes the honors amongst the various patentees. The last edition of Hopwood's book was published ten years ago. C. F. Jenkins also published a book which is a useful contribution to the bibliography of the subject. So did Cecil Hepworth, now president of the Hepworth Manufacturing Company, London. This is a very useful little textbook, also published about ten years ago. These four books constitute a useful little library in themselves. There are other books dealing with the subject, but, generally speaking, they cover ground that is traversed in the four that we have mentioned.

The making of history of any particular subject demands on the part of the historian very rare qualities of mind. A historian must be an honest man, a truthful man, acquainted with the subject, competent to weigh evidence, absolutely impartial, just, and a scholar. The very latest would-be historian of the moving picture does not possess a single one of these attributes. In fact, he is the very negation of what a historian or indeed a man should be. Three weeks ago, under the caption, "A Liar and His Lies," we felt it our duty to expose the monumental ignorance of this individual in regard to some matters of fact in which the name of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and one of its editors was concerned. In other words, in the interests of the business, its good name and our own, we nailed a series of lies of which this individual was the author. Now, once again, in the interests of historic accuracy, we have to take an equally drastic course, and brand this individual as unworthy of the credence of honest men, honestly engaged in promoting the interests of the moving picture. The last issue of his publication contained a column of mingled facts and fiction directed against one of the editors of this publication as to which the only comment called for is this, that a man who would make use of private letters for polemical purposes in a newspaper is beneath contempt. But there is a little matter of history which must be taken notice of in the interests of truthfulness and accuracy. Historians, as we know, go to all sorts of sources for information for their material. They get all the evidence they can and then sift it down, retaining the wheat, blowing away the chaff, getting at the truth and the facts of the case.

Now, some day somebody will get down and write a good book, dealing with the history of the moving picture, and he will naturally turn to the present periodicals for his facts. Indeed, the ordinary newspapers are doing so now. We often read in these newspapers, articles compiled on facts, first published in our own pages, therefore we are naturally jealous for truth and accuracy. In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, two or three weeks ago, paper was suggested as a substitute for celluloid for moving pictures. The self-styled "Editor" of the "Moving Picture News" therefore delivers himself of the following statement:

"We showed to T. Bedding, in October, 1908, some paper negs in our possession, taken in a Cinematographic camera in 1886, perforated, etc."

It would be impossible for even an expert impostor and charlatan—even by the aid of his favorite horoscope—to condense more falsehoods into such a short space. A more impudent series of lies was never printed in the "Moving Picture News." In the first place, he never showed any paper negatives to T. Bedding, in October, 1908; in the next place, there was not a cinematographic camera in existence in the year 1886,—that is twenty-four years ago. In the next place, neither the man

Saunders nor anybody else took any paper negatives, perforated or unperforated, in a cinematographic camera, in 1886. No transparencies were made from these paper negatives; also, you don't make transparencies from moving picture negatives. You make positives, which are not viewed as transparencies. Finally, history—true history—says, and says quite accurately, that the first moving picture negatives ever made on a flexible support in a moving picture camera, were exhibited at the Chester meeting of the Photographic Convention of the United Kingdom, in June, 1890. For any man, therefore, to come out twenty-four years afterwards, and such a man as this "editor," and claim to have taken paper negatives in a cinematographic camera in 1886, is nothing less than a piece of imposture quite au fait with the other impostures of which this person has been branded guilty over and over and over again.

We are writing this article in the interests of historic accuracy, truth and justice. The personal venom which this charlatan periodically projects at us elicits only our contempt and still further lowers the author in the eyes of all decent men.

In the same number of the publication, which we are showing up to be an absolutely untrustworthy authority on the subject, appears the following paragraph:

"In the year 1300 Mr. Roger Gaynor made a small wooden box large enough to cover him and allowed a small hole in the top—say a pinhole—and he saw by this means an image could be thrown upon a screen. A little later an Italian took a looking-glass and saw that light could hold an image. Gardin, in 1650, invented the convex lense, and he used that in place of a pinhole used by the other man. In 1808 a man by the name of Daguerre conceived the idea that by coating a piece of copper with silver he was able to hold an image, and for forty years he worked and others called him a fool and an idiot, but he gave to the world the Daguerreotype."

Here be more history in the making. It was not Roger Gaynor who made the small wooden box. Gardin did not invent the convex lens; Daguerre did not conceive his idea in 1808, and he did not work for forty years. All the essential facts of this quotation are false, worthless and misleading, as this soi disant "editor" should know, if he would take the trouble, or had the intelligence, to consult a few reputable textbooks on photography.

PAYING THE FIDDLER.

By C. W. Lawford.

Why a Meritorious Few of the Present Must Continue to Suffer for the Sins of Many in the Past.

All over this country, and even in Great Britain, has arisen one of the strongest demonstrations ever started in the amusement world, the prohibiting of the recent Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures as any kind of a public exhibition. It would appear from the particular stress laid upon this particular fight, which took place July 4, at Reno, Nev., that the general trend of ill-feeling is not against fight pictures as a whole, because no voice was raised against the Nelson-Wolgast, or the Johnson-Burns fights of the recent past, but against this one exhibition in particular. Why? Consensus of opinion differs, and differs widely; some acclaim brutality; this would not seem reasonable to suppose, for if prize-fighting is in any way brutal, the former pictures of the Nelson-Wolgast mill show more brutality to the square inch than any bull-fight of the old world ever witnessed. Others predict race riots all over the country from the fact that the victor of this championship battle was a colored man; this might be possible in slum districts or possibly in the South, but as a national feeling, never.

The more probable reason, and the one that appears to have the largest support, is the strain and pressure this particular fight, due to the physique of the contestants, brings to bear upon the moral, criminal and civil laws of our country, and principally because they are not a fit class of pictures for young children to see. In support of these probable reasons I submit a recent letter from Mayor Gaynor of New York to Secretary William Shaw of the United Society of Christian Endeavor:

"Dear Mr. Shaw—Your favor of July 8 is at hand. I do not mind saying to you that I am having the matter carefully examined, and examining it myself to see what power there is in the criminal or civil authorities here to prevent these pictures from being exhibited. I have a report from my Commissioner of Licenses that prize-fight pictures have been exhibited in this city for many years, and are now being exhibited, and up to this time nobody has come forward to say that they were immoral or indecent.

"Nevertheless, a thing has to be done for the first time by somebody. In this city it may be that we shall have to await an ordinance by the Common Council, or an act of the Legislature, prohibiting the exhibition of such pictures. Or it may be that I can discover some lawful way of doing it now. If I cannot, I shall not step outside the law to do an arbitrary act.

"Sincerely yours,

"W. J. Gaynor."

Mayor Gaynor is noted for being a learned, broad-minded and decisive official and a man possessed of the higher ideals. His letter is particularly cautious as regards his future action in this matter, and his reference to the past reports of his License Commissioner as regards former fight pictures would make it appear that this national outburst is the culmination of a general disappointment because a white man could not hold the championship belt. But why should all this animosity and persecution be directed against the innocent moving picture? Why all these grafting laws and ordinances? These continual protests that the moving picture theater is the earth's greatest den of corruption and vice and the stepping stone on the road to ruin of many a young girl? Cheapness and commonness, is the answer. By cheapness I mean cheap prices of admission and too keen competition among the exchanges. By commonness I mean overproduction by the film manufacturers before the parting of the ways and later by the Association and Independents, individually and collectively.

You, Mr. Exhibitor, and you, Mr. Film Renter, are chiefly to blame for your greedy and competitive methods, namely, letting the public see something of a first-class nature in the amusement world for almost nothing, at prices like 5 cents and 10 cents, and then not being contented with this slap at the dignity of so high an art as the moving picture you had to start in lengthening your show by adding more reels, and, as if 5 cents was not a small enough admission, you in many cases gave matinees for 3 cents and a premium. You even went further and engaged poor singers, because you could get them cheap; you engaged poor operators, or allowed boys to run the machine; you rented a cheap store, pulled out the front window, bought a second-hand machine, tacked up a sheet, put in a few chairs little better than camp stools, bought or rented a cheap mechanical piano, opened the doors and sicked this mess of junk onto the amusement-hungry and "something for nothing" public as a motion picture theater. Very few real showmen would do these things, but my remarks chiefly apply to the swarm of near managers who sneaked in when the picture game was young, managers and proprietors who had no more right in the moving picture field than a blacksmith would have in the jewelry business.

Mr. Exchange Man, you are to blame for being too competitive, going after new business too hard, cutting prices, making all kinds of promises to get a customer away from the other fellow, and then giving him junk after you got him—sometimes worse junk than he got before he went over to you. True, you had to keep your films moving to get back your money, but you did not have to keep them moving until they bordered on the scrap heap. You further encouraged some of these near managers by acceding to their demands for new pictures every day, or every hour, if they got it into their amateur brains that they wanted them and would give up a little more money, and you could get the subjects. These managers' sole aim was quantity instead of quality in their greedy efforts to close up the other fellow, and you humored them in it to a certain extent, thereby forcing the manufacturer to flood the market, and in order to keep up with the demand he had to put out poorly acted, disconnected and badly staged comedies and Western dramas,—which brings us up to you, Mr. Manufacturer, who are to blame for allowing these wild and inconsistent factions to dominate your output and thus force you to a heavy expense, shortage of subjects and consequently poor production.

Of course I know that many of the above faults have been remedied through co-operation, which was sadly needed, by the way, but there still exists a battling tendency in the picture world that is doing much to cheapen the picture game and surfeit the public of this excellent form of amusement, and while the Patents Company have been altogether too lenient in carrying out many of their promises and rules, they must at the same time be given due credit for ridding the field of many of these amateur managers and junk film exchanges, and for their efforts, also the Sales Company, in trying to place moving pictures on a higher plane. Nevertheless, the facts still remain that pictures in the first place were exhibited at too small a price, and the public have tired of too many picture theaters and above all of seeing too many pictures in one show for so small a price.

Cheapness of price and overproduction tends to make anything common and less sought after, and this applies more to the amusement world than to any article of commerce. Something for nothing is always sought after by the general public, particularly the lower classes, but no man on earth ever gave it to them and made money in the long run.

Ten years ago an actor, Henry Waitte by name, conceived the idea of giving the theatergoing public a repertoire of popular plays and Broadway productions at 10, 20 and 30 cents, the then smallest prices in the show business. This same Henry Waitte lost all he had in the scheme, and the many repertoires that have followed him have fared some mighty good and some very badly, most of them badly, but the point is that repertoire to-day is almost extinct simply because the country was flooded with repertoire companies; the prices were so cheap that the public could go oftener, there were so many of them that in order for some of them to clear expenses they were obliged to put on cheap royalty plays and engage cheap performers, thereby giving a black eye to repertoire that still hangs to it.

I do not claim that the moving picture is a dead issue, not by any means; it is still a popular form of amusement, and had it originally started on a safe and sane business and artistic basis as we would suppose a modern enterprise would be conducted, and by men who know from past experience how to handle the public without tiring them out, you would see to-day one of the greatest forms of amusement and education the world has ever known instead of what we now see, an invention that will slowly drift from the amusement field to the higher fields of learning and science. It threatens to rise over the heads of the poorer classes, thereby losing at least one-third of its value, that of a pleasant form of entertainment, unless, as I have previously hinted, the exhibitor, the exchanges and the manufacturer get closer together, cut down this overproduction, eliminate cutthroat competition and raise the price of admission where it will give all interested a chance to make a dollar, encourage the manufacturer to higher efforts and place the future motion picture on the pedestal it should have been from the start, that of the highest type of amusement, education and help to scientific research ever discovered.

SEEN AT KEITH'S UNION SQUARE.

The licensed releases of Thursday, July 21, presented a program of more than usual strength. Selig's "Mazeppa" is a moving picture classic. This magnificent production must have taken weeks, nay months, of arduous preparation. We had entertained doubts as to the possibility of the story of Mazeppa being translated into a convincing moving picture. We left the show with the conviction that the Selig Company could tackle anything and get there with honors.

On the same bill was Kalem's "Corporal Truman's War Story," one of the best, if not the best thing that the Kalem Company has ever done. Splendidly staged and worked out with infinite care, this picture drew loud applause from the audience.

A Biograph comedy, "Serious Sixteen," kept the audience in a titter all through the piece, and a short Biograph drama, "As the Bells Rang Out," completed a reel that will be popular and profitable. The fourth reel, a well-acted Lubin drama, "John Graham's Gold," ought really to have been replaced by a Lubin comedy to properly balance the program.

An excellent lecture and several vaudeville acts completed a program which drew a well-filled house on a sultry evening.

But then Keith's is always cool and a pleasant retreat at any hour of the day.

ESSANAY MOVEMENTS.

Mr. G. M. Anderson, who returned to Chicago from Mt. Morrison, Col., where he had been directing the production of the Essanay Western pictures, is busily at work on a number of big comedy pictures to be booked for release at an early rate. The feature of features among the Essanay comedy hits will be a baseball picture entitled "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," which was produced last week. Those who have seen the negative of the picture report it to be one of the most humorous comedy subjects released by the Essanay Company "in many moons," and that means a great deal. Two years ago the Essanay Company released a comedy picture of the same nature under the title of "The Baseball Fan." This picture swept the country like wildfire and proved to be one of the most successful films ever released by the Essanay. The picture just finished is said to be superior even to the former picture. It contains actual baseball park scenes during a game between two big teams of a big league, while the story, its comedy situations and acting will be found to be uproariously funny.

LUX GRAPHICUS AND THE RELIGIOUS PICTURE.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

What a complex quantity is Lux Graphicus; having read, and re-read, his dissertation of July 16, I find it necessary to make an analysis of the same to find a solution of the problem he presents concerning the appropriateness of religious pictures in a moving picture theater. At the very outset let me say that I do not agree with Lux Graphicus in either his premises or his conclusions. Desiring the jury of readers to agree with me, let me proceed along the lines laid down by an eminent lawyer, who advises: "When in argument, admit your opponent's truths and facts; deny his fallacies; establish your own conclusions." By this rule I readily admit the truth that "there is a place for everything, and everything should be in its place." Yet, without being facetious, it may be added, the "place" to which many things belong, is not the only place in which they may appear. When, therefore, Lux Graphicus asks the question, "Is the religious picture in its place in the moving picture theater?" he provokes the answer: that it may not be at home there, but that does not necessarily mean that it is out of place.

Yankee-like, I would like to ask Lux Graphicus, Can the reasonable and wise use of anything that is good be out of place anywhere? Admittedly true the moving picture theater is primarily to "entertain and amuse" and not a place to educate and instruct in either a scholastic or religious sense. The introduction of anything along positive educational lines and with that object in view in a place of amusement would not be either reasonable or wise; but this does not mean that everything which is not strictly entertaining and amusing must be eliminated. There are many subjects, both religious and secular, which because they are interesting may be included in any theater. Is it not a fact in all places in which the average normally intelligent human mind visits, that the entertainment shall possess a degree of interest? It is true people do not want to be "bored," but they do want to be interested; and while many exhibitions may never show religious pictures, their arbitrary exclusion would be as narrow-minded in a theater man, as if a narrow-minded church minister should arbitrarily exclude from his people the entertaining and amusing.

Now what about the fallacies in which Lux Graphicus indulges? He tells us distinctly that he does not desire to be conclusive in his statements, yet upon two occasions when he feels he can draw anti-religious picture decisions from previous writings, he says, "Them's my sentiments." Twice, also, he carefully informs us, "I am not arguing the matter," yet he devotes about a column to what he calls "pros and cons," which are always argumentative. "Facts" are the matters our friend presents; I have still to learn that facts can be as paradoxical as those he gives.

In the first instance Lux Graphicus tells us he fears that in a moving picture theater "there is a possibility of "vulgarizing these beautiful religious pictures." What! Does a moving picture theater "vulgarize" the good and the beautiful? Lux Graphicus fears so. Is that which "entertains and amuses," "vulgarizing"? Surely in his haste to make out a case he has hurt his own cause. I personally have a better opinion of the moving picture theater, and dissent from this his opinion. Again in another place he fears the religious pictures may "repel" some, and being "repellant" injure the profits of the exhibitor. What a strange "ringing of the changes"! First the surroundings hurt the religious pictures; next the religious pictures hurt the surroundings. Really, Lux Graphicus, kindly inform us what you mean in this paradox. When we know, perhaps we can answer.

Again our friend, while asking for opinions, tries to leave no room for differing with him because he only states "facts," thus: "A business man does not want to be bored with religious matters in business hours." What has this to do with either religious or amusing pictures? What a straining of a point to force a conclusion. If Lux Graphicus will take his own advice and be "frank and honest" he will not deliberately mix things up to prove that they are out of place; and after a good mix-up, point the finger and say, "Don't you see everything ought to be in its place?" It is easy to describe and criticise a condition thus specially created.

Let us come now to some conclusions. We are reminded that if a church fails in its mission it is because it lacks attractiveness and interest; the same applies to a moving picture theater. Many have already failed in their mission because they lacked true attractiveness and interest; therefore they have brought down righteous indignation of authorities upon them, besides tainting the whole moving picture world.

Lux Graphicus asks for "evidence." Surely this is evidence enough, and herein lies the solution of the problem.

The steam engine must have its "governors," the horse must be held with bit and reins, or both would run away; religion is the balance-wheel of the whole human race, and while an indiscriminate mixture of the sacred, secular and profane would produce the sacrilegious, it cannot be said that a judicious introduction of religious pictures in an entertainment can be productive of anything but good; neither can they detract from the true pleasure of the amusing. Whenever a number of people are gathered together there are diversities of tastes, and the successful man is the one who studies these tastes, having in view the purpose for which they are there, and trying to fulfill that purpose without resorting to offensive extremes, or indiscriminate mixings. Trying to please everyone, is as much a fallacy as trying to please one; the average must be met with the greatest good or satisfaction or interest, whether it be in theater or church. Lux Graphicus calls his dissertation a "sermon"; he surely knows that a sermon expounds a truth, text, or subject; if his "sermon" had been upon "The suitability of a portion of a religious service in a moving picture theater," his "discourse" (excluding his paradoxes) would have been excellent; but when he is only speaking of religious pictures in an amusing and entertaining place, he is not true to his text; his arguments are fallacious and his conclusions strained and mixed. Were we called upon for further evidence we should say that we have yet to know that religious pictures proved "repellant"; on the other hand, the lack of something like the balance given by pictures of a higher tone, even if not religious, have repelled many, and this negative gave opportunity for the development of a lower moral tone which aroused criticism. If religious pictures are to be associated with questionable vaudeville or reproductions of questionable plays, the principles we have laid down as those governing "a reasonable and wise use" will be violated, but we are sure Lux Graphicus has nothing of this in mind. We agree with him, there is a place for everything and everything should be in its place, whether church, school, or theater; that this means there is only one place for each we cannot agree; there is a wise relationship of one to the other and the principles for which they stand; religion, education and entertainment may find a mutual ground without sacrifice or loss, but rather we hope for gain. Commercially, I agree with Lux Graphicus that classified trade means larger trade, but I do not agree with him that an entirely separated trade would be more profitable, offering in evidence an advertisement of the film of a religious subject as being "beneficial to exhibitors who desired to please church people." While not approving this "sop" like idea, it proves the value or profit of the method. The editor of a New York paper, when asked why he published moral essays and sermons in conjunction with all sorts of objectionable news, replied that he preferred to run the chance of pleasing all his readers by giving each their need, besides which there was always the possibility of doing some good.

If in these columns I were criticising the church I could hardly follow Lux Graphicus in his reason for church failures; this is not the time or place; nevertheless, it can with propriety be said that the principles advocated as controlling the religious in conjunction with the secular and the entertaining, may also apply to the latter in conjunction with the former. It is wise to bear in mind that we are governed by principles which, while not necessarily called upon to mix together, cannot escape the truth that they have a relationship one to the other; and the right uses of their relative values is the proper method of securing the best results of either or both.

Paradoxical.

Should moving pictures ever stand still? Strange though it may seem, this is not an unnecessary question. There are undoubtedly times when even as a procession halts for the purpose of an interview or examination of any particular subject or part, so an intelligent exhibitor will know when there are parts in the subject of his film, upon which the beholder desires to know details, and where it is not only proper but essential for the thorough understanding of the scene, that there should be a sufficient pause. This fact became apparent to the writer when watching the marvellous reproduction of King Edward's funeral; there are two scenes the importance and value of which cannot be exaggerated; they are, of course, the group of nine ruling monarchs, the ex-President of the United States and the representatives of the rulers of every other civilized land. The first scene is when riding in London, the second when walking in Windsor, and although most intense interest centers in these particular events, it was absolutely impossible to "pick out" or note even half of the notable and important personages. Here were places for a profitable "halt," giving time for a recognition of the world's rulers in life; also, were it possible to have a "lecturer" he could here make a most instructive and attractive explanatory addition.

Two important things to be remembered in the study of the moving pictures are: First, they are life or living pictures and as such must represent life in all its phases; second, that while the moving picture machine succeeds and supersedes the stereopticon, it must also do the work which its predecessor did, or there will be a "gap" in its work which will prove a detriment to its full value.

When in its progressive march the moving picture becomes the thorough servant of the instructor or entertainer the many needs of its intelligent manipulation will present themselves, and we are looking forward to the time when all this will be accomplished. It will be a great day when it will be possible to come away from an exhibition fully satisfied with all both seen and heard; the constantly recurring remarks, "If we could only have seen this" or "If we could only have known that," or further, "If we could have understood," are in themselves indications of the urgent needs of what things are necessary to make perfect a splendid work, and, although some things may seem paradoxical, knowing their value we believe their possibility is assured.

FILM MEN CONVENE AT NIAGARA FALLS.

On July 16-17 a large gathering of film manufacturers and renters assembled at the Hotel Imperial, Niagara Falls In some respects it was the most remarkable convention of moving picture interests that has ever been held The object of the meeting was to bring together the Sales Company and all the independent manufacturers, and show to the exchange men represented by the Alliance that peace reigned in all camps. The manufacturers held a brief session and ratified the board of officers of the Sales Company. They then adjourned to the cafe where a toast was drunk to the absent president, Carl Laemmle, who is at present in Europe.

Mr. R. G. Bachman, the Alliance president, then called a joint meeting of the Sales Company and the Alliance members at which each ratified the mutual working agreement.

Altogether the gathering at Niagara might be likened to a love feast—only that there was no formal banquet. After the business meeting the delegates organized pleasure parties and had a good sociable time. Mr. Bauman and Mr. Cochrane led a party of venturesome spirits through the Cave of the Winds. Other parties visited the Gorge Route and other points of interest, and as they dispersed the unanimous verdict was that it was a happy ending to a long series of unpleasant business meetings and that now everyone felt free to go home and give up their whole time to the making and selling of good pictures.

The Moving Picture World slogan of quality is being seriously taken up by the Sales Company members of the trade. David Horsley is talking quality and it is showing in Nestor films. Thanhouser informs us that he is sparing no expense in his effort to make Thanhouser films the most talked-of on the market. The Dramagraph Company, a new concern, shows us their first reel, well up to the average of their competitors, and assures us that when their plant gets into running order we may expect to see some stunning productions The Owl Company have taken a twenty-one year lease of the spacious studio on West Twenty-first street, built by the late Stanford White. Their specialty will be high-class dramatic productions. The Defender Company, until their own factory is complete, have been releasing subjects made by the ill-fated World Film Manufacturing Company, but the members of the Defender Company are past masters at the game and promise some startling innovations in picture plays. The Powers Company have engaged the best available talent and their picture plays are indeed justly popular. Atlas and Yankee are competing on quality and others too numerous to mention are all talking quality, quality, QUALITY.

But the most obvious and the most stable developments in the independent field are the laboratories and studio that are being erected at Coney Island The Carleton Motion Picture Laboratories, under the direction of Mr. Carleton, formerly with the Gaumont Company, is a vast undertaking We visited the plant expecting to see an ordinary converted building. The perfection and magnitude of the plant was indeed a surprise. The latest and most improved machinery and ideas are all there. The laboratory equipment is intended to be the best in this country when completed. The great capacity will be utilized for developing and printing the negatives of the Bison, Owl, Reliance and other producers. The Reliance studio will be in a portion of the building and is so far completed that work is being done there. Money without stint is being expended to get the best of everything, and the quality talk of Mr. Bauman, the head of this concern, is certainly based on sound foundation.

We shall reserve a full description of the Carleton Laboratories and studio until they have been completed and can promise some interesting reading.

The moving pictures are certainly keeping in the limelight. Nothing has occupied more prominent space in the news columns than the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures since the tariff was under consideration. A feature of the whole affair is the ridiculous situation in which some of the loudest expounders of morality find themselves, despite the efforts of yellow journals to sustain and encourage them. The "Evening Journal" of New York has been in the foremost rank of the silly brigade. It devoted considerable space and big type the past week to stir up a religious fanaticism, alleging that a prominent leader of a well-known religious organization had been grossly insulted by Mayor Gaynor, who is charged with declaring that the leader was a fool and he represented fools. Of course all who read these articles and knew the prejudice entertained against the Mayor by the paper named treated the charges as they deserved to be received. The reputed leader wanted the Mayor to prohibit the production of the fight pictures in Greater New York. He did not do so. They have been presented in one theater in Brooklyn and two theaters in New York City since June 16, 1910, and in two or more theaters in the same city since the latter part of the week. Had the Mayor been so disposed he would not have allowed an exhibition of the fight after the first night, at which time he or his representatives had opportunity to see them and decide whether or not they were of the degrading character so many people who had not seen any of the pictures had declared them to be.

Mayor Gaynor refused from the first to act hastily in the matter. He took his time and has since rendered his decision in a special message to the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York. It is this: There is no law by which the case can be settled. The Board of Aldermen should adopt an ordinance either permitting or prohibiting the exhibition of the pictures. The Mayor is powerless in the matter and it rests with the Board of Aldermen to make the matter a penal offence.

It is well to state here that Mayor Gaynor is an ex-member of that judicial body known as the Supreme Court and during his many years upon the bench he considered and decided many questions of far more importance and weight than the one that has been raised by the bunch of limelight seekers who have been so industrious in their efforts to ruin the people who have made the exhibition of the fight pictures possible.

Who is the so-called leader of the Christian societies who alleges that when he called upon Mayor Gaynor to have the exhibitions stopped the Mayor branded him and his supporters as fools? The "Evening World" of July 19 seems to answer the question. The man who alleges he was insulted by the Mayor appears to be Alexander A. Lowande. The newspaper supporting him has announced that a mass meeting of the Christian Endeavor Union of Greater New York, the Epworth League, the Lutheran League and the Baptist Union is to be held to protest against the Mayor's action and the exhibition of the fight pictures. The "Evening World" says:

"Leo E. Archer, Vice-President of the Christian Endeavor Union, who, in the absence of the president, the Rev. George E. Merriam, D.D., is at the head of the whole organization, made the following statement to-day to an 'Evening World' reporter: 'Mr. Lowande, I believe, is a consistent reader of the paper which made the announcement. He is also active in politics. Please make it as strong as possible that the Christian Endeavor Union is not behind Mr. Lowande's projected mass meeting, that it does not in any way sanction or indorse it, and that when the president, Dr. Merriam, returns to the city, steps will be taken to discipline Mr. Lowande and put the Christian Endeavor societies in a right attitude before the public and the press.

"'Most of us are personally opposed to the exhibition of these fight pictures. If there is any legal way to prevent their exhibition we would, in common with all other law-abiding citizens, want it enforced to the letter. But we are more interested in spreading the Gospel than in anything else.'"

That is a pretty good cool-headed slap upon the wrist for Mr. Lowande and his counterparts, isn't it? It is also a sound whack upon the cranium of the prejudiced newspaper that declares Mayor Gaynor dodged action in the fight picture case.

I have an esteemed friend in Minneapolis, Minn. He is the Rev. G. L. Morrill, who conducts the People's Church in that city. On the Sunday following the fight at Reno he preached a sermon with the fight as his theme and I think that, in view of the widespread attention the fight upon the pictures has attracted, some space should be given his views. In that sermon he said: "The fight pictures won't injure any man who goes to see them. They can't be as lurid and bad as the press pictured accounts which have been forced into our homes in morning and evening editions. 'Race riots' is a cry to 'suckle fools and chronicle small beer.' To say that in Minnesota whites and blacks would go from the fight pictures to pound and punch each other's heads is an insult to the manhood, intelligence and character of its citizens both black and white."

I take the hand of both Mayor Gaynor and Rev. Morrill and commend them for their spirit of fair play. It is calibre of the kind they display that keeps bigotry, injustice and oppression under control. Were it not for such people many other worthy industries and enterprises than the moving pictures would be repeatedly crippled and ruined through wanton ignorance or design.

* * *

Rev. Morrill refers to race riots. Many of the people who have been trying to suppress the fight pictures have held this same topic up as a fearful result sure to follow the exhibitions. In my last letter I covered the race riot zone, and I believe I conclusively showed that the fight itself was not responsible for the disturbances. For more than a week I have visited the exhibitions of the fight pictures in New York City and in Brooklyn and, although the audiences consisted of both white and colored people there was not the slightest indication of disturbance at any of the exhibition places. I also wish to add that all the managers of these places made it an imperative rule (and saw that their employes carried it out) that no one under eighteen years of age be admitted to the exhibitions. This step was not taken because the pictures were not fit to be witnessed by children, but because the managers wished to avoid further annoyance by being hounded on charges that they were admitting children to the theater.

The brutality argument against the fight pictures falls as flat as a pancake. I believe I have seen all the moving pictures of fights since they were first introduced and I can conscientiously declare that the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures are as remote to brutality as any ever made, and far more so than the majority of them. I have seen bull fights, athletic contests, military and other displays that aroused me to a far higher pitch of apprehension and uneasiness than the reproduction of the Reno affair did at any stage of the game.

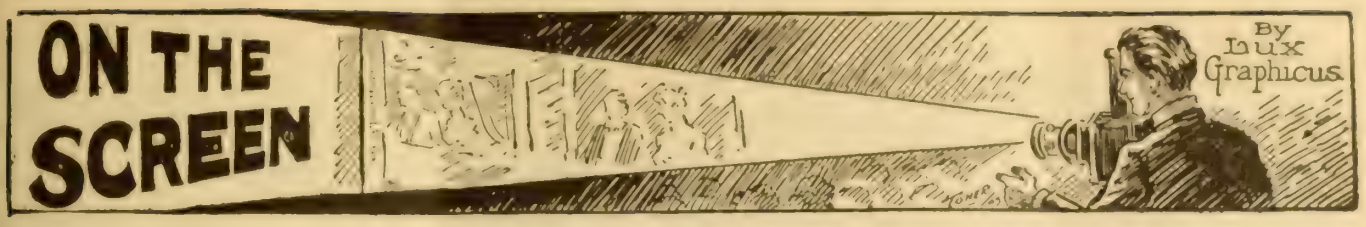
To be honest about the matter, I will say I do not look upon fights between pugilists as conducive to the elevation of the moving pictures. Even so-called friendly scientific bouts can be very readily disposed of without the least loss of prestige; but I do not sanction the toleration of such events and an annihilation of the reproduction of them after an immense outlay has been made in good faith, and legally, to secure them. If the opposition to such pictures wishes to prove its good faith it will make such events a violation under the law, and also their reproduction. In the absence of such laws it is impossible to act consistently and with fairness.



I want to talk art this week. What is art? Innumerable are the definitions that have been given in reply to this question. At the moment perhaps the most satisfactory one that occurs to me is this: Art is nature seen through a temperament. Which means to say that art, whether it be graphic art, histrionic art, decorative art, or indeed any form or variation of art, is largely personal. It must be so, of course, in the very nature of things. There is all the difference in the world between the work of John Sargent and James MacNeil Whistler. Both are and were great artists or rather great painters; both have and had temperaments and personalities which show in their work.

I am, if the reader will forgive the conceit, egotism, or whatever he will have it, a bit of an artist myself. That is to say, years ago I went through something of an artist's curriculum, and thereafter the Society of Arts, in London, gratuitously awarded me a certificate, indicative or expressive of the fact that I had mastered the rules of composition, light and shade, and what you might call the fundamentals of black and white work.

* * *

Years after when I took up photography, I found that early training very, very useful. It taught me to see at a glance whether a thing was right or wrong in composition, whether it was faulty or not in lighting or grouping; whether, in fact, the grammar or elements of pictorialism had been complied with in the making of the photograph. For, as has been pointed out over and over again in The Moving Picture World, a photograph, whether it is a stationary or moving photograph may be either purely photographic, that is, a mechanical transcript of the original, or it may be pictorial. There is no reason why every moving picture that is made should not be pictorial. Again, I say, as I have said over and over again, very few moving pictures are pictorial, in that they mostly violate some or many of the rules of composition, etc.

Now I want, if the reader will allow me, to take last week's issue of The World as the text of this little sermon. I will take upon myself to point out what should not have been done in certain pictures that are illustrated in the advertisements. I am quite sure that the good sense of the various manufacturers whose pictures I am criticising will prevent them from falling into any misconception on this matter. I am just taking what I would call the ordinary photographic standpoint, and I am submitting one or two criticisms which, if appreciated and availed of in the proper quarters, will prevent, or may prevent, the repetition or the recurrence of what I will call mistakes in the makeup or the composition of the pictures before they were photographed.

I take the Lubin releases, advertised on page 180; I take the Nestor, advertised on page 223; I take the Vitagraph, advertised on page 224. Let us examine each of these pictures from the purely photographic point of view. In "John Graham's Gold," the Lubin release of July 21, the cut shows three figures—two women and a man—in an interior. With the general posing I have no fault to find. It looks natural. But consider the figures in relation to the background. A fluted column seems to rise out of the man's body. The girl's head seems to look part of the curtain in her rear and, similarly, the elder woman is also standing against a curtain which at first glance seems to form part of her.

Once you get this admixture of accessories with figures, you cannot lose it. It worries you. It makes you say to yourself: "Ah, what might have been if so and so had been done." All this intermingling of the figures with the scenes or accessories could have been avoided if the figures had been placed on the stage a little more to the left or right, as the case might be, so that their heads, or indeed their whole bodies, would appear in the photograph on the screen, or in the cut in the paper, as framed up by the wall or the open door, or some part of the scene which would form a natural background for a figure. My meaning is made perfectly clear by a reference to the other Lubin release, advertised on page 180, called "The Stepdaughter." Here, while one of the figures is not very happily placed in relation to the background, another of them, a girl, is standing against what looks like to be an opening or panel in the wall, so that her head and bust are sharply outlined against the background and do not seem to blend into it.

Here I come to the Nestor release, "Back in the Mountains," advertised on page 223. My friend, David Horsely, is, I know, so broad-minded that he will not resent a little friendly criticism. Six figures stand ouside the stoop of a house. In the foreground are three men, between whom are two women. The general posing of this picture calls for little comment. But, will it be believed, that from above the heads of each of the three men a post seems to protrude? These posts look, in fact, as if they were growing out of the heads of the men. This is not a very important matter, but it certainly detracts from the pictorial value of this picture. The posts are ugly, still, perhaps, they could not be dispensed with. At any rate the figures in this picture could have been so posed that they would be removed from the posts, their heads and bodies appearing against the plain background of the picture or wall of the stoop, for such it is. Here again the woodenness, the artificiality of the arrangement in this picture was not perceived by those responsible for its production, whereas, with a little judicious rearrangement and posing, quite a satisfying picture might have been made out of it.

The third picture that I criticise is the reproduction of "Davy Jones and Captain Bragg," a Vitagraph release of the 22d inst., the cut of which appears on the back page of last week's issue. There are three figures in this. Out of the body of a sailor man or officer, the branches of a tree appear to be growing. Similarly a post and some branches are springing, as it were, out of the head of the woman. Then the fisherman, and especially his profile, is surrounded by some wholly superfluous bushes. In fact, the little picture seems burdened with what I would call unnecessary surroundings. The result is that the composition of the picture is haphazard and unsatisfactory.

I am applying these criticisms just in the same manner as I have done for years to thousands of stationary photographs which it has been my duty to criticize. The motive is the same. I want to help those who are responsible for the making of moving pictures to get down to the modern idea in the way of composition; the elimination of the superfluous, the unnecessary, the distracting. In each of these three photographs the figures are, generally speaking, well posed. Interest centers in the figures because they are the dramatis personae of the films. Yet how confusing the backgrounds look and how superfluous the backgrounds are when you become sensible of the fact that the relationship of the figures to those backgrounds is unnatural, haphazard, unpictorial and, as I have already said, distracting. Let any intelligent reader of these paragraphs take the pictures or, indeed, take any moving picture which is reproduced in cut form, grasp the main intention of the picture and then eliminate from it all or much of what is unnecessary. It is astonishing what a difference it may have.

The making of moving PICTURES is no easy thing. This has been said so often in these pages that the careful reader must be getting somewhat tired of it. Yet it is necessary, nay imperative, in the interests of the business that the vital importance of pictorialism in the moving picture should confront us all at this moment, both literal and independent manufacturers, renters, exhibitors, press and public. Indifferently popular though they may be in this country, the French, Italian, German moving pictures are undeniably pictorial almost without exception. The British pictures are not pictorial, besides being unsatisfactory in theme and treatment. The American pictures are here and there pictorial, and that is all.

I submit that there is no reason on earth why all American-made pictures should not be properly pictorial. The foremost painters of the world at this time are Americans. So are the foremost photographers, professional and pictorial. In architecture, music, the drama, literature, America is taking a foremost, if not a leading place, in the world. Nobody, therefore, can accuse me, an Englishman, of a rooted antipathy to things American, if I venture to suggest that a similar avenue to success lies before the American moving picture maker. His work is clever in conception, but, generally speaking, it lacks the pictorial qualities of the French, Italian and German schools. Given those qualities, given the qualities of pictorialism, dramatic fibre in the dramatic subjects, perfect technique in all of the subjects, technical, industrial and the like, then the American-made moving picture will be placed in a position of unassailable pre-eminence.

A WEIRD SPASM OF VIRTUE.

By F. H. Richardson.

It is astonishing, not to say astounding, how saintly and extremely moral those conservators of the public welfare, yclept the newspapers, have suddenly become, concerning the matter of the exposition of the prize fight pictures. Now, the writer does not care to be understood as taking sides, either for or against the showing of these pictures in public. He has noticed, however, the following facts, for which it would seem some lucid explanation might possibly be in order. Before the fight, the newspapers, practically without exception, gave the Jeffries-Johnson fight perhaps the biggest line of advertising any single event of late years has received. Their pages were plastered with the most minute accounts of every action of the principals, and scarcely could Jeffries or Johnson sneeze, or scratch his head, without the fact being duly chronicled and thoroughly illustrated. At the time the fight was pulled off, immense sums were spent for special wires and every possible endeavor was made by each of the daily press to be the first to place the record of this disgraceful (?) affair before the minds and eyes of the public, whom they are now claiming will be so terribly injured by the exposition of the prize fight pictures. Nor was any offer made to keep these papers from the hands of the children who, in thousands and thousands of instances, read the account of the prize fight with even greater avidity than did their elders. It might also be noted that every effort was made to get the photographs taken at the ringside to New York and other places at the earliest possible moment, presumably in order to degrade the morals of the readers of the public press by spreading them upon their pages where both old and young, octogenarian and infant, might gaze to their heart's content upon the horrid sights in the ring at Reno. And why was all this done, may I ask? Methinks the question is easy of answering. It was because there was money in it, and for no other reason under the sun. But, now that the daily press has squeezed every possible copper from the public by thus degrading their morals (I use the word degrading because the press is so free with that term in relation to the pictures), they suddenly flop over, indulge in a bath of whitewash, and lo and behold, presto, chango, the prize fight they have so luridly exploited upon their pages, not for weeks, but for months past, becomes a menace and a danger to both young and old through the exposition of the prize fight moving pictures. If this fight was to injure the children and degrade American citizenship, let us ask, why did the newspapers make the spectacle possible by allowing it space in their pages, since I venture to say that had the press remained silent, there would have been no prize fight, or at least it would not have amounted to anything. I notice in a current issue of a New York daily newspaper that one Alexander A. Lowanda, who called upon the Mayor with a set of resolutions against the prize fight pictures, says that he was astonished at the Mayor's bitterness and prejudice. One thing I can say, and that is, I like that man's nerve. I most certainly do! The man who can go upon an errand, the very genus of which is bitterness and prejudice, and then can flop over and talk about those two articles, certainly is worthy of public notice. I think it would be of interest if the daily papers could find time to explain their unique position as hereinbefore set forth. But I can imagine them tearing their coats off to thus explain that which cannot be explained.

KALEM REPRESENTATIVE KEEPS IN CLOSE TOUCH WITH THE EXHIBITOR.

When a manufacturer keeps a man on the road to get first hand information as to what kind of films are most popular with the public, it is but reasonable to expect that they will profit by their knowledge. Almost anything can be sold by judicious advertising, even luxuries, but when a concern goes to the consumer, learns his wants and seeks to supply the want, it places that commodity in the class of necessities even if it be a luxury. It is a shrewd idea and it has proved to be a profitable one, at least as far as the sale of Kalem films is concerned.

But while it can hardly be called advertising, it is equally expensive or more so. Mr. William Wright, of the Kalem Company, has travelled over 14,000 miles throughout the United States during the past three months. From coast to coast he has visited and talked with theater managers and listened to the comments of the patrons of the show houses. Wright has a winning personality and has no trouble in getting the information he is after. He is also methodical and keeps a diary of his travels. We have been favored with a peep into this diary and extract therefrom the following notes about a recent trip he made to Baltimore, Washington and vicinity:

Washington.

The destinies of the licensed film exchange in Washington are presided over by that king of hustlers, Tom Moore, who is making a record for himself. Out of about 62 licensed theaters in the city the Tom Moore Film Exchange is supplying 43. This is certainly going some. Mr. Moore advised me that out of about 70 moving picture theaters in Washington only seven theaters are running Independent films and the probabilities are that these so-called Independents will be using licensed films shortly. Tom Moore reports business as excellent for this time of the year and in going over the town I found all the theaters located in the shopping district were very well patronized indeed.

A syndicate of strong men in Washington own the majority of the downtown theaters which are manager by Mr. A. Brylawski. Among their theaters in the center of town are a number of really attractive buildings.

The Cosmos, located on Pennsylvania avenue, cost, building and ground, $260,000. The theater seats 900 and runs two reels of third-run pictures and four acts of vaudeville. The pictures are changed daily and the vaudeville weekly. Sunday they run pictures and a concert. The price of admission is 10 and 20 cents. Mr. A. Julian Brylawski is the local manager.

The Meader Theater, owned and operated by the Meader Amusement Company, located in the southeastern part of the city, cost $30,000 and seats in the neighborhood of 550 people. Admission is 10 cents. In this house pictures only are run. They use three reels of fourth run and change daily. As an added attraction this house has a very good orchestra. H. A. Wolf is the local manager. Business is stated to be excellent.

The Colonial Theater, located on Pennsylvania avenue, owned by the Colonial Theater Company, seats 350 people and runs pictures exclusively. The admission is 5 cents. Two reels of third-run pictures furnish the entertainment in addition to a very fine organ that is played by an organist of marked ability. The Colonial Theater Company paid $90,000 for the building and ground. Mr. A. Julian Brylawski is the local manager.

The Pickwick, on Pennsylvania avenue, is a very nice little house and the oldest standing picture theater in the city. The house cost $70,000 and has a seating capacity of only 160. Pictures exclusively are run in this theater, where they exhibit two reels of third run having a daily change.

The Palace Theater, on Ninth street, seats 240 and charges 5 cents admission. Two reels of third-run pictures afford the entire entertainment. Pictures are changed daily.

The Pastime Theater, located on Pennsylvania avenue, seats 450 people and charges 5 cents admission. Two reels of fifth-run pictures furnish the entire entertainment. Vaudeville was tried in this house but proved a failure.

The Metropolitan, also on Pennsylvania avenue, has a seating capacity of 250 and charges 5 cents admission. In this theater they run two reels of fifth-run pictures and one of commercial. Pictures exclusively furnish the entertainment.

The Happyland Theater, located on Seventh street, N. W., seats 250 and charges 5 cents admission. Two reels of fourth-run pictures furnish the entire entertainment.

The Casion Theater seats 159 people, charges 5 cents admission and runs two reels of pictures.

The Scenic Theater seats 330 people and runs two reels of pictures. The admission is 5 cents.

The Plaza Theater, operated by the Capitol City Amusement Company, seats 318 people and runs two reels of pictures, charging 5 cents admission.

The Auditorium Theater seats 2,000 people, charges 10 cents admission and runs four reels of pictures which furnish the entire entertainment.

The Lafayette seats 200 people, charges 5 cents admission and runs two reels of pictures. This theater is operated by the Royal Amusement Company.

Mr. A. Brylawski, in connection with his picture theaters in Washington, publishes a very elaborate program that is distributed at the Cosmos, Palace, Colonial and Pickwick theaters. This enterprise is presided over by Mr. A. Julian Brylawski. The program is gotten up in a very neat manner and when visiting one of the theaters where it was distributed I noticed the people were very careful to take it away with them. In this program they publish a short synopsis of all the pictures that are running and to be run the coming week at the four theaters mentioned above. Considering this, the month of July, the people in Washington are patronizing moving picture shows very liberally and the downtown picture theaters most certainly are making handsome profits.

Baltimore.

The cool weather we had Monday and Tuesday of last week was certainly a Godsend to the picture theaters. In an automobile I covered all the outlying portions of Baltimore in the evening, visiting the majority of the licensed theaters. In each place I found the houses doing an excellent business and the local managers were praying that the cool weather would last. Many expressed themselves greatly surprised at the boom the cool weather has given business and called my attention to the crowds in a number of instances waiting outside to be admitted.

The Carrolton is a nice little house, seating 186 people, charging 5 cents admission. Hood & Schiltz are the owners and managers. They run two reels of pictures and change three times a week. The pictures furnish the entertainment exclusively.

Just across the street from the Carrolton is a house running independent pictures. To note the condition, I stepped across the street and for a short time observed a number of people entering and found a marked difference. For every one person patronizing this show from five to seven, by actual count, went into the licensed theater.

Pearce & Scheck rent the Y. M. C. A. Hall, on Carey and Baltimore streets, from the Y. M. C. A. and run three reels of pictures for 5 cents. This hall has a seating capacity of about 415.

The Horn Theater, operated by Frank and Paul Hornig, seats about 192, but will be enlarged this Summer to a seating capacity of 362. They run two reels of ten-day-old pictures and change daily. Business at this house I found was excellent.

The Theatorium seats 500 people, running pictures only and charges 10 cents. Three reels of pictures about two weeks old are run with a daily change.

The Plaza Theater has a very elaborate front and has a seating capacity of 210. The owner and manager is Mr. David Newman. Pictures only are run at this house. The admission is 5 cents and the business is very good indeed.

The Leader Theater has a seating capacity of 382 and is operated by the Victoria Amusement Company. Admission is 5 cents. Pictures and vaudeville furnish the entertainment. Two reels of thirty-day pictures are run and one act of vaudeville.

The Clifton seats 234 and charges 5 cents admission. Ward & Viola are the owners and managers. Three reels of pictures furnish the entertainment.

The Majestic Theater seats about 220 and charges 5 cents admission. Mr. A. Anderson is the manager. Pictures exclusively furnish the entertainment at this theater.

The New Pickwick seats 250, charges 5 cents admission and is open from 10 in the morning until 11 at night. One reel of first-run pictures and one reel two weeks old are run in this house, with change days Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. The Baltimore Amusement Company operate the theater. Business is excellent.

The Pickwick Theater, on West Lexington street, seats 235 and charges 5 cents admission. They run four reels of pictures with a daily change. William and John Fait are the proprietors. The house is open from 10 in the morning until 11 at night.

The Great Wizzard seats 470. Pictures exclusively are run in this house, the admission being 5 cents. Bohannon, Lewy & Fuld are the owners and managers. This house has a very elaborate front and nicely arranged interior. It is open from 10 in the morning until 11 at night. They run two reels of pictures changing twice a week. The Seneca Film Exchange, of Philadelphia, is supplying the film service very much to the satisfaction of the managers of this up-to-date theater.

The Dixie, on West Baltimore street, seats 187 people and charges 5 cents admission. Four reels of pictures are run. The theater is operated by the Dixie Amusement Company.

The Liberty Theater, operated by the Liberty Amusement Company, sats 189 and charges five cents admission. Pictures exclusively furnish the entertainment. One reel of ten-day stuff, one of thirty-day and two commercial fill the bill.

The Red Moon Theater seats 400 and charges 5 cents admission. In this house they run three reels of pictures, some of them being put on as talking pictures. The program is changed daily. Mr. Charles Wintehurst is the owner and Mr. Horace K. Lutwyche is the manager.

The Victoria Theater, on East Baltimore street, is operated by the Victoria Amusement Company, has a seating capacity of 1,800 and charges 10, 20 and 30 cents. Pictures and vaudeville furnish the entertainment. This house is an exceptionally good paying investment.

In this connection I noticed a remarkable fact. Right near the Victoria, on the same side of the street, is located the Gaiety Theater. This is strictly a vaudeville house, but was obliged to close this Summer through lack of patronage. Directly across the street from the Victoria is the Wilson, also a vaudeville house, which closed up from lack of patronage. Does not this prove that pictures are the magnet that draw the people?

The Grand Theater, at Baltimore and Holiday streets, seats 300 and charges 5 cents admission. The Victoria Theater Company operates this successful house. They run two reels of pictures, only changing three times a week.

The Eureka Theater, on South Fremont avenue, seats about 300 and is operated by the Eureka Amusement Company. The admission is 5 cents. Two reels of pictures are run, changing three times weekly.

The South Preston, located on South Charles street, seats about 250 and is operated by Hartlove & Kohl. Two reels of pictures, changing daily, furnish the entertainment exclusively.

The Royal Theater, on North Monroe street, seats about 100. They run two reels of pictures and change daily. Aursler & Foss are the owners and managers.

The Pleasant Hour Theater, on Fulton avenue, seats 250 and is managed by Donkos & Konstant. They run two reels of pictures daily and charge 5 cents.

The Electra Theater, on North Gay street, is operated by Mr. M. Milhauser. Admission is 5 cents. They run three reels of pictures, changing three times a week.

The Gem Theater, on East Baltimore street, seats about 200 and is run by the Gem Amusement Company. They run two reels of pictures, changing daily.

The Federal Picture Parlor, on Light street, seats about 300. They run two reels of pictures and change three times a week. Jones Bros. are the owners and managers. Admission 5 cents.

The Fairyland Theater, on North Charles street, seats 275. They charge 5 cents admission and run two reels of pictures with daily change. M. Veto is the owner.

The Cupid Theater, at Light and West streets, has a seating capacity of 200 and charges 5 cents admission. Harig & Staylor are the owners. They run three reels of pictures and change three times a week.

The Colonial Theater, on North Gay street, charges 5 cents admission and is operated by F. H. Durkee. This house has a seating capacity of 275. Three reels of pictures furnish the entertainment and are changed three times a week.

Th Amusa, located on East Baltimore street, is operated by the Victoria Amusement Company and has a seating capacity of 275. They run one reel of pictures, changing daily.

Pearce & Scheck have the only licensed rental exchange in Baltimore. In addition they operate about 14 big paying theaters in this prosperous burg. Among these 14 are some of the handsomest moving picture theaters in the city. They are all clean, well ventilated and in charge of local managers who know their business. Both Messrs. Pearce and Scheck hope to attend the F. S. A. convention at Detroit, but as the coming president is expected in Baltimore very shortly they may not get to the city on the lake.

I found the business of the licensed theaters in Baltimore exceptionally good for this time of the year. Several of the theater owners were doing almost as much business now as they had done during the Winter. This was due to the fall in the temperature.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"A Child's Faith" (Biograph).—Interest centers in the simple faith of a child who believes in the efficacy of prayer, and when a shower of gold comes down the chimney she accepts it as a gift from heaven. The miser to whom it belongs is the father of the little one's mother, from whom she became estranged years before. The faith of the child touches the old man's heart and a reconciliation follows. The principal feature is the little girl's faith, and that alone makes the picture notable. Its influence is wholesome and it might make a difference in the viewpoint of some of the men of the world who may see it.

"The Adopted Daughter" (Lubin).—A melo-dramatic picture depicting the troubles of a young girl who is treated like a slave by her foster parents, and endeavors unsuccessfully to escape the caresses of a Mexican. Enter now the rescuer, who chases away the Mexican, incurs the usual hatred and in the end takes the girl home, where all the evidence tends to show that her troubles are over.

"The Golden Secret" (Melies).—Even an Indian may communicate valuable information, and if one falls at your feet in the desert, imploring you to give him water, don't kick him. He may repay the kindness with telling you where to find a gold mine. The interesting feature of this film, the race of the young wife for the land office, is exciting. To see her go down the mountainside, swinging far out on a lariat, is startling enough to arouse the most jaded consciousness. It is a good picture, and one feels like extending personal congratulations when the sheriff arrests the villain and the wealth belongs to the young couple.

"A Vacation in Havana" (Edison).—A love comedy quite out of the ordinary. The scenes are laid in romantic Havana, and as the lovers go about from place to place the audience has opportunity to see a great many of the interesting sights. Of course these two never seem to see them. They are much too busy with their own affairs to know much about Morro Castle, or any other features of scenic interest. A troublesome father intervenes very persistently, or the crowds of sightseers are more than ordinarily strenuous. The climax comes, however, when they succeed in thrusting the father into a dungeon, where he is left to his own devices for an hour or two. When they return a ring glistens on her finger, nor will they release him until he consents to the marriage. The sympathetic acting and the picturesque background combine to make a picture which is realistic without being dull, and lively without being silly. Altogether it is an excellent picture, worthy of the house from which it comes.

"How Bumptious Papered the Parlor" (Edison).—The same Bumptious who had an adventure with an owl a while ago. The audience that can sit through this picture without roaring must be composed principally of dead ones. The numerous difficulties encountered by Bumptious are too laughable to be adequately described. But if you can imagine a room after a well developed cyclone had cavorted through it you can gain some conception of how this parlor looked after Bumptious fell off the ladder. These Bumptious comedies are funny and will give a lively touch to any program.

"A Political Discussion" (Pathe).—A curious end of a supposed murder. Here are two friends engaged in a political altercation. One hits the other and apparently kills him. Then follows some lively complications, including the revival of the supposed dead man, and finally both are placed in the same cell in prison. Mutual recognition and reconciliation follow. The interest lies in the unexpected ending rather than in any material strength in the story.

"Please Take One" (Pathe).—Bonehead gives evidence of returning intelligence in this picture, changing a handbill sign "Take One" from bills to a fruit and vegetable stand. The result is about what might be expected, and when the proprietor calls for the police they distribute the various articles to the crowd, and finally arrest him when he continues to complain. That Bonehead should exhibit a spark of intelligence is the interesting feature, and the way he makes it manifest adds to the fun.

"Corporal Truman's War Story" (Kalem).—Scenes incident to the observance of Memorial Day by the veterans are followed by a dinner at which Corporal Truman is asked to tell the story of his empty sleeve. The story is told in pictures, and told so graphically that one almost rises at the end to cheer the gallant veteran. Perhaps no more exciting war pictures were ever placed on the screen, and apparently everyone feels like joining in the outburst of applause which follows the corporal's toast to the Stars and Stripes.

"Her Uncle's Will" (Vitagraph).—A clever society comedy drama, telling how the snobbish father of a young man was pulled down by a clever heiress who he mistook for a dairy maid. It is a love comedy, with more than the ordinary degree of interest, and throughout its entire length, of practically 1,000 feet, it hasn't a dull moment. Acted with the snap and dash which characterize the work of the Vitagraph players, it will fill a half hour very pleasantly.

"Trailed to the West" (Essanay).—A story of grim vengeance. Perhaps it would be unwise to say that either of the men did right, and yet there is a sympathetic feeling in the breast of every man which would influence most of them to condone an offence against the laws, which had a basis like this. When a home is wrecked in this way one sometimes feels that almost anything is justifiable. The effect upon an audience may not be altogether desirable, but there can be no question about the interest the picture excites. Somehow such a scene touches one's heart and there is more or less sympathy with the man who inflicts his own punishment instead of appealing to the law.

"Jupiter Smitten" (Gaumont).—Representative of a little joke by Jupiter who, because things are dull in his domain, impersonates another man and goes to his wife. Some excitement ensues when the real husband returns and objects to Jupiter's presence. Then Jupiter changes back, and frightens the couple. But being in a joking mood he forgives the husband the blows and leaves the reunited pair to their own devices.

"The Jolly Whirl" (Gaumont).—A trick picture purporting to exhibit the marvelous powers of a medium. The way he mixes things is a caution. The excellence of photography under the circumstances is remarkable. A good many amusing combinations result, adding to the merriment of the audience.

"A Good Loser" (Pathe).—An interesting love episode, in which a young man's desire to help his friends without their knowing it is frustrated by a telltale letter. At any rate, the fellow who helps the mother and daughter in their need gets the girl, while the other young man proves himself a good sport, and even though he loses congratulates the couple heartily. While the picture can make no claims to any special dramatic strength it is not disagreeable. The acting is sympathetic and pleasing and the scenes seem natural and convincing.

"Algerian Stud" (Pathe).—A good picture maintained in Algeria by the French government. It is a record picture, intended to convey accurate information of what the government is doing in the development of thoroughbred horses. The photography is remarkably good. The difficulties of the subject were all overcome and every figure is clear and clean cut.

"A Broken Symphony" (Vitagraph).—A dramatic love episode, depicting very graphically the hopeless, unspoken love of a poor, deformed fiddler, who ultimately marries another. The character of the fiddler, pathetic in its representation of misery and utter hopelessness, will attract by its power. It stands out sharply from the others, yet the remainder of the company give good support. It is a picture which will linger in the memory, whether one chooses to have it or not.

"A Flash of Light" (Biograph).—A strongly dramatic picture, yet not altogether pleasant. A love story representing a man sorely deceived, and after an accident depriving him of sight and hearing cruelly deserted by his wife. Then she is induced to come back as the bandages are removed from his partially restored eyes so he may not know the truth. The climax, when the former wife pulls down the curtains, and lets in the blinding flash that destroys the partially restored sight forever, is not pleasant, and yet it adds a strong ending to the play. Acted with the ability shown by the Biograph players, this picture will be popular, even though disagreeable, because it arouses the emotions. No matter if they are depressing, the fact that the emotions are stirred is sufficient to make the film popular.

"Rosemary for Remembrance" (Lubin).—A love story gone wrong, with a disappointed girl grieving her life away, and eventually falling dead as her lover returns, and he eating his heart out alone grieving over something for which he was not originally to blame. The strength of the story cannot be questioned, and this is perhaps proved by the distinct feeling of sadness which follows the film. The dramatic opportunities are made as much of as a capable company can do, and one is quite willing to compliment them upon the accurate interpretation of the piece. The memory of the picture will linger long, despite the fact that one might wish to forget it.

"Mistaken Identity" (Pathe).—A mix-up in the love affairs of a married woman that terminates in a duel between the husband and the wrong man, and the husband falls. This leaves the wife free to go with another man who she really loved. If any more complicated plot could be conceived for a motion picture the author deserves a prize. Tangled love affairs form a basis for a considerable proportion of the mo-

"Awful Symphony" (Pathe).—A comedy which introduces some novel scenes, notably those with the umbrellas. It is interesting to see what can be done with such awkward objects as this. The alleged music by the band, aand its effect are cleverly portrayed, and the dissolution and re-appearance of the musicians are cleverly managed.

"Old Loves and the New" (Edison).—A love complication which comes perilously near the shipwreck point, but serious consequences are averted by the intervention of the father of one of the young men, who quietly, but effectively, straightens out the tangles and prevents one of those tragedies which frequently embitter whole lives. The scene shifts from New York to the South African gold fields and back, and the characteristic features of these widely separated and different backgrounds are maintained throughout. The play is well developed dramatically and the features keep the interest up throughout.

"The Failure of Success" (Gaumont).—What sometimes happens to a plain man unexpectedly elevated to success is here clearly depicted. Fortunately the doctor is saved from succumbing to the wiles of the actress and again, in another way, it is the action of children that prevents it. The feature of the film is the acting of the children in it.

"Twa Hieland Lads" (Vitagraph).—A comedy, novel in its conception and filled with rich humor. It gives opportunity for two very funny characters to lose themselves in a series of funny situations. The Vitagraph people have produced in this a picture which will make an audience laugh, regardless of where it is and what it is. It is lively enough to suit the most fastidious person, regardless of his particular taste in fun.

"The Thief" (Essanay).—A novel detective story, which illustrates the cool effrontery of a diamond thief and the remarkable intuition of a detective who located stolen jewels by analogy. The picture is made interesting by representing the thief at a reception, showing how he steals the jewels and finally by showing the detective at work. Whether this picture would come under the classification of those who assert that motion pictures sometimes suggest methods of committing crime is a question not easy to determine. At any rate it is an interesting film and will be deservedly popular.

"Haunted by Conscience" (Kalem).—A military drama, out of the ordinary and abounding in absorbing situations. Care in preparation and unusual care in acting have been lavished upon this picture. Everyone who admires a strong drama will like it and everyone who likes good acting will want to see it again. The improvement shown by the Kalem people in all departments of their business is marked and this film is one of the most pronounced of any of them.

"Manon" (Pathe).—A French love story, turning upon the fickleness of a French woman. Whether or not the same implied charge would be true of any other woman is a matter which each individual who sees the picture may determine for himself; but it is plainly enough charged here, and the doings of the young woman bear out the implication. She is so uncertain about which man she does want that her most powerful lover becomes disgusted with her actions and has her deported. Probably this story has a deeper meaning abroad than it has here. At any rate it is not sufficiently interesting to American audiences to warrant the waste of film required to produce it.

"Through the Enemy's Line" (Urban).—A war story representing a boy goatherd as taking important dispatches from a wounded carrier and after some adventures, including the pushing of his captor over a precipice, he puts the papers in the right hands and receives merited commendation.

"Pekin, the Walled City" (Urban).—A trip to the mysterious old city of Pekin. And one likes to make these trips with Urban's camera man. He understands the most effective point at which to place his camera to secure the best picture. And when one has made the rounds of Pekin in this way he has acquired a knowledge of the most important phases equal to that obtained from a visit to the city. The life of the city is also accurately reproduced, and one can see what the people actually do in their daily round of duties and pleasures. It is an excellent piece of work and the firm deserves commendation for producing it.

"Catching Lobsters" (Pathe).—An industrial film, illustrating lobster catching, which, when seen in this way, becomes an exceedingly picturesque and interesting subject. All the operations in lobster fishing are reproduced with fidelity and one may sit in a comfortable theater and acquire all the information required to understand this industry.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Prodigal Son" (Great Northern).—A story of a convict reformed under the influence of his mother. He serves his time and disappears in a foreign country. It is a graphic confirmation of the old observation that every person, no matter how bad he may be, has some good in him, provided the right influences can be brought to bear to bring it out. Often it is the mother who accomplishes this apparently impossible task, and in this picture it is the mother who causes the prodigal to turn from his evil ways. The old father has to die, but it seems an artistic necessity and need not be too much regretted. But the others live on to be happy after the clouds have disappeared from their domestic skies.

"Granddad's Extravagance" (Centaur).—An interesting commentary upon the pleasure which a child may enjoy with his grandparents. The old boy and the young boy are mutually satisfied. The father of the boy turns the old man outdoors, but realizing what might happen to himself in the future, he recalls the old man and allows things to go as best they can. It is quite well to enforce the lesson that as one treats the old, so he will be treated when he gets old. The picture is a good one, full with little human touches that increase its attractiveness.

"The Saloon Next Door" (Imp).—A lively love story, with an objecting father who keeps a jewelry store. That store is afterward robbed and the suitor succeeds in running down the thieves. After that objections are abrogated and he gets his girl. This, after all, is the main proposition, but there are many interesting features to the story before the fellow gets his girl.

"Red Fern and the Kid" (Bison).—An Indian love story with the trimmings required to make it interesting. It may be said that the cowboys strike the wrong trail as usual; otherwise this story would lack interest. But, however that may be, and however many complications may arrive, the ending is satisfactory, since Red Fern and the Kid are happily united and she becomes his Squaw for life.

"The Greatest of These Is Charity" (Lux).—A well acted and pretty story, portraying with much sympathy the love of a little girl for her grandfather. The lady who assists the little girl when the grandfather is in the hospital, and finally takes them both to her home, is a type of charitably disposed persons who are doing much to improve the condition of the unfortunate. One sees this film disappear with a more emphatic impression of the beauty of charity properly bestowed, and of assistance worthily rendered.

"Bill's Serenade" (Lux).—A comedy depicting the misfortunes of a young military man who went serenading. But landing in a butt of water, where he is found by his superior officer has a tendency to cool his ardor and the imagination can form a picture of what happens to him at the barracks.

"The Converted Deacon" (Thanhouser).—Sometimes even a deacon can be converted to ways that may seem to him wicked. And here is one that overlooks his objection to the theater when he discovers that his daughter has made a success of it and proves it by performing for his benefit.

"The Lucky Shot" (Thanhouser).—That a shot from a toy bow and arrow should open a secret door and disclose a store of wealth is the main features of this picture. This novelty raises the film above the ordinary, which nothing else discloses. A child in shooting his arrows about a room accidentally hits a secret spring, opening a door which shows the wealth left by his grandmother. It solves the problem for himself and his mother, and because of this is a happy ending for an otherwise unpleasant outlook.

"The Voice of the Blood" (Itala).—A dramatic picture, affording opportunity for this capable company of actors to present a picture of power. It holds the attention from beginning to end, and whether one agrees with it or not one must admit that the story is well worked out and convincing as shown.

"Mother-in-Law, Son-in-Law, and Tanglefoot" (Itala).—Here is a combination that will excite your risibles, no matter how gloomy you may be, and you will agree that there are occasionally fresh applications of the old mother-in-law joke. What happened to the son-in-law will surprise you somewhat.

"A Jealous Wife" (Powers).—The doctor in this picture, who was devoting too much attention to a handsome dancer, got a good scare, but a happy re-union followed, with all cause for jealousy on the part of the wife removed. Evidently the wife had good cause for jealousy, an improvement upon some instances, where no cause exists.

"The Nurse's Trunk" (Eclair).—A lively comedy, representing the consequences of the trick of a pair of young scamps who dress in women's clothes and fool a family into employing them. The stunts with the trunk are lively enough and surprising enough to keep the audience laughing and guessing at the same time. Considering the rapidity of the movement in some places the film is well photographed.

"To-Morrow is Pay Day" (Eclair).—Not everybody has the same experience when longing for pay day to come, though in a less aggravated manner this gentleman's experience and feelings are perhaps repeated in almost all instances. The tantalizing nightmare may arouse memories in others; but then pay day comes at last and everybody is happy.

"The Right to Labor" (Yankee).—A strike story that may carry more of the true conditions attending many strikes than shows on the surface. Often enough the difficulty is due to the oppressions of a manager, and goes on only because the owner is indifferent, or lives at a distance and does not know true conditions. Few owners are so selfish that they will not grant reasonable demands if they are made to understand the situation; and this picture teaches the lesson very forcibly. Unfortunately it will not meet the eyes of many employers. On the other hand, it may do good by showing to dissatisfied, or possibly anarchistic employes where their trouble is in some instances, at least. Some of the horrible consequences of a strike are clearly shown, and the entire film is calculated to foster a better spirit between employers and employes. In that respect it performs a distinct public service.

"A Message of the Sea" (Bison).—A love story woven around the quest and discovery of a buried treasure. The villain interposes obstacles in quite the customary way, but the treasure is found and the lucky discoverer gets the girl, too. Isn't that a sufficient reward for a little hard work in digging? The novelty is the coming ashore of a bottle containing information by which the treasure is found.

"A Game of Hearts" (Powers).—A thrilling runaway and rescue, a feature of this picture, will make it popular. There is an amusing exchange of lovers, with representation of some very ardent lovemaking after the exchange is made. Much comedy results from this which adds materially to the pleasure aroused by the film. Some clever acting is introduced, and the broker is particularly lively when his rich sweetheart breaks with him, returns his ring and leaves him free to make love to his typewriter.

"The Girls of the Ghetto" (Thanhouser).—A pretty love story laid in the East Side sweatshop district. The scenes in Chinatown, where the lost child wandered, will be recognized by those who have been there. The episode of the fever and the nursing of the grateful girl adds to the dramatic strength of the picture. And then comes the wedding, and two people doing settlement work instead of one. Love is the same in all stations and all localities and there is much in this picture, with its reproduction of East Side conditions, that will tend to rouse the charitable impulses of the thousands who will see it.

"Romance of a Jockey" (Ambrosio).—A story having the spirit of the racing turf in it and working out to a satisfactory and dramatic conclusion. The actors perform their parts with sympathy, and there is a rush and swing to it which carries one forward almost irresistibly.

"Some Riding Exercises of the Italian Cavalry" (Ambrosio).—Startling performances by Italian cavalrymen, representing dangerous and altogether sensational feats of horsemanship. One scarcely knows which to admire most, the performances of the men or the horses, in some of the complicated work shown. It represents long and arduous training of both men and animals.

"Back in the Mountains" (Nestor).—A feud over a boundary dispute, interwoven with a love story, and action so swift that it keeps one's interest at the fever-heat mark, make this film a thriller. But just before any real killing is done, though it must be agreed that the action at times approaches perilously near that point, the surveyors return and settle the dispute. Then everybody, including the lovers, falls into everybody's else arms, and the dove of peace contentedly circles over the erstwhile warring neighbors. The ending is satisfactory, and as long as no one was killed the picture may be considered unusually interesting.

REMARKABLY LONG LIFE OF GENERAL ELECTRIC RECTIFIER TUBE.

That the General Electric mercury arc rectifier for moving picture machines is more than fulfilling the claims of its manufacturers is evidenced by a letter from D. H. Rockwell, manager of the Coast Theater, Tacoma, Wash., which reads as follows:

"June 18, 1910, was the anniversary of our mercury arc rectifier tube, with 4,745 hours to its credit. We think that is going some." It will be a great satisfaction to the many users of this device to know that it is making such records as this. The great saving which it effects in current consumption and the improvement in the pictures due to the white, clear, steady light delivered on the screen have made it an indispensable part of the moving picture man's equipment, and led to its universal adoption.

EBERHARD SCHNEIDER GETS A MOVE ON.

Eberhard Schneider, of the German-American Cinematograph and Film Company, manufacturers of cameras, perforators, printers and other film making machinery and which manufacture is known as "Miror Vitae Products," has bought the Pensacola Club house, 219 Second avenue, near Fourteenth street, this city. This beautiful building, which is a five-story brown stone on a lot of 26 by 112, will be altered into a "home of modern cinematography," provided with all necessary machinery to manufacture everything in the moving picture line of an elevated grade from his own patented ideas only, which are protected by over 87 United States letters patent. The new single illuminant double dissolving stereopticon moving picture machine combined, of which some very beautiful demonstrations have been given lately, will receive Mr. Schneider's most careful attention. The new Miror Vitae Product Building will run its products on strictly neutral lines with a welcome to everyone.

PATHE'S AMERICAN COMPANY MAKING GOOD.

When Pathe Freres first proposed to make pictures in this country, exchangemen and exhibitors awaited their first American release with interest, for they knew that if Pathe Freres could produce good American subjects with the same photography and finish that they placed in their French films, they would have some great features for their audiences. They were not disappointed. The first release of an American production by Pathe Freres was "The Girl from Arizona" on May 16, just two months ago. This was followed by some fine features, the best of which have probably been "The Flag of Company H," "The Great Train Holdup," and "White Faun's Devotion." But Pathe Freres with their well-known energy and push are never satisfied, and are always striving for something better. They are now announcing for early release some American productions that they state far excel those mentioned above. The most pretentious is "Under Both Flags," announced for release on Wednesday, August 3. This is a tale of the civil war portrayed in the most realistic manner and staged regardless of expense. The story is a good, interesting one and the battle scenes are most vividly shown. They will release on Friday, July 22, a Western drama, "The Cowboy's Sweetheart and the Bandit," which is full of snap and go, and which is as good a Western picture as was ever projected on the screen. Two full reel comedies are also slated for release. "Tommy Gets His Sister Married" will appear on Friday, July 29, and "Her Photograph" on Saturday, August 5. Both of these are crackerjacks and full of original situations that are sure to please. This last film is especially good and has won great praise from some of the film men who have seen the sample.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Although many persons try to make us believe that the moving pictures have seen their best days and that the industry is going to the dogs, we are pleased to hear that many exhibitors are still making good money and are far from being discouraged.

Mr. M. Christie, proprietor of the Majestic Theater, of Victoria, B. C., is in town on his way to New York and a pleasure trip to Europe, a sure proof that a well-conducted moving picture theater can make some money and allow a pleasing vacation to its owner.

We do not deny the fact that the industry is suffering in certain districts, but it is what we have repeated many times, the fault of the exhibitor. Although Chicago is ahead of New York on moving pictures, Chicago has not yet the perfection, and Mr. Christie told us that if he was to manage his Majestic Theater like most of the exhibitors of Chicago he would have a hard time to meet both ends. If Mr. Christie was not pleased with Chicago what will be his impression of New York? J. M. B.

Woodlawn offers many advantages for high class picture houses, in that it is a centralized outlying business center in which the family enjoys the evening together, visiting the shops along Sixty-third street, and other diversions within their bounds. There are four moving picture theaters on Sixty-third street, and two of these being closed for the Summer leaves but two to offer amusement for the many people who pass along this busy street every night. The Comus Theater, an Independent house, is located at Sixty-third street and Cottage Grove avenue and the other, the Palace Theater, is at Madison avenue and Sixty-third street. There lies a wide area of separation between the two.

Mrs. Henry, who owns and manages the Comus, seems to be a shrewd and capable business woman who personally attends to the running of her house, which has a large patronage. This theater is of a good size, seating in the neighborhood of 200 people. The operator, Mr. Hagle, who seems to know his business, projects a clear picture on the screen.

Numerous electric fans keep the house cool and comfortable even on the warmest night, which is one reason for its good patronage. The side lights here are of purple and green, properly shaded so as to reflect the light away from the curtain and not in the eyes of the audience. The seats are so arranged as to give an excellent view of the screen from any part of the theater.

In the Comus was brought to notice the fact that many families were present, showing that the patronage was for the most part regular. This, in our estimation, is what counts; that steady, praise inspiring patronage that spreads publicity broadcast and unsolicited.

The Palace Theater, a licensed house, owned and managed by Mr. Chas. Fecher, gets the strollers from the other end of Sixty-third street and was crowded with all ages and sexes on the night visited by our representative. The seating capacity here is about 250 and so well arranged that an excellent view is obtainable anywhere in the house.

The operator, Geo. Govey, projects his pictures in first class style. He has the same difficulty to contend with as Mr. Hagle, of the Comus, old films. But he, in spite of this fact, makes a good showing and pleases the audience to the utmost.

Fight pictures seem to have taken a fast hold on the concessionaires of the leading amusement parks as a money-making proposition in the show line. Out at Riverview Exposition, in the Passion Play building, was just finished a most successful run with the Johnson in training pictures, the first of this class of films to be shown. Mr. De Shon, who manages this concession, wears a beaming smile of satisfaction, which denotes wealth in the symbols of the show business, and is more than pleased with his new find. Fully convinced of the worth and public interest in such films, he has now taken on the portrayal of the Nelson-Wolgast contest, issued by Mr. B. E. Clements, the Chicago representative of the Great Western Film Company, of San Francisco. The result has already pleased him beyond all reason of bounds and promises well for the future.

Sans Souci Park also has these pictures and reports show an enormous increase for the concessionaire, and this success we attribute to the fact that people have now come to realize that the picture show is all that is painted on the display boards outside and that the showman in charge has no reason for exaggeration.

Mr. De Shon, of Riverview, has stated that if possible he fully intends to obtain the big fight picture for his concession as soon as they can be placed on exhibition in Chicago.

The Haymarket Theater, located at West Madison and Halsted streets, has asked for a permit from the police of Chicago to run the pictures of the fight between Johnson and Jeffries. It has not been given out whether this permit will be granted or not, but the general opinion is that there will be no interference if the management will consent to certain provisions that will eliminate harm to the younger set.

SLIDES OF THE PUGILISTIC CONTEST.

A set of highly colored and photographically perfect slides depicting the most interesting incidents in the fight between Johnson and Jeffries at Reno, have recently been placed at the disposal of the exhibitors by the Cosmopolitan Slide Makers, of Chicago, who have established a reputation by the high-grade quality of their work.

These pictures were taken at the ringside and show the fighters at so close a range that each move and facial expression is clearly and easily discernible. Each set of these slides is sent out with a printed reader, covering the fight round by round and greatly adding to the interesting features of the pictures themselves. Another added attribute is a large photogravure showing in one poster eleven views of the fighters in characteristic poses, which makes a most attractive lobby display.

There are fifteen slides in this set, each of which is colored by hand by experienced color artists, who stand unsurpassed in their line of work. The pictures when projected on the screen present to the view a sight as natural and in reality more interesting than the original fight which took place on July the 4th, in that little town of Reno, the outcome of which defied the laws of physics and allowed darkness to conquer the light, long before the sun set in the "Golden West." THE DRAMAGRAPH COMPANY.

A New Independent Film Manufacturing Firm.

This newly formed company commands our sympathy and good wishes in virtue of the fact that they have been quietly at work for several months, have not been precipitate in the matter of releases, and are in no hurry to release now. In fact, it will not be for a month hence, before their pictures are on the market. It is too much the fashion with new manufacturers in the Independent field to succumb to the fascinations of the virus photographica. Do we not all know the Kodak aspirant who has a feverish passion for making his exposures and getting his prints? We have observed something of the same trait amongst the Independent manufacturers, who have come into the game these last twelve months. They have been in too much of a hurry to make releases. The consequence is that neither photographically, dramatically nor in any respect have they done themselves justice. So they have had to "try back" and begin all over again, learning the useful but expensive lesson that the making of moving pictures—good moving pictures—is something more than is involved in the possession of a respectable balance in the bank.

Mr. Shaw, who is the manager of the Dramagraph Company, is a successful New York exhibitor, who should know what the taste of the public is. The company has adapted premises in a convenient section of New Jersey at Fort Lee, where, amongst agreeable surroundings, they have every opportunity for making good studio and out-of-door pictures. We feel some pride in welcoming the Dramagraph Company into the field. A year ago there were no Independent manufacturers round about the city of New York. Now there are many, thus constituting the Empire City the world's metropolis of the moving picture. The two sample Dramagraph pictures that we inspected this week, "Beyond Endurance" and "Only a Jew," show that the Dramagraph Company have command of very fine dramatic talent and have certainly, for new beginners, climbed high up on the ladder of photographic technique. Indeed, in this latter respect the company is to be distinctly congratulated; it was the consensus of opinion of those before whom their pictures were shown that, despite here and there some slight faults, if we may so term them, of dramatic construction, the general photographic and productional qualities of the pictures were quite the equal of the best Independent subjects. The Dramagraph Company has made an auspicious start upon which we expect them to improve, because Mr. Shaw and his able partner, Mr. Sherwin, have so much intelligence and enterprise that we are confident they will not rest content until the Dramagraph picture is the equal of, or superior to, the best that is made in this market.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

A Seeker After Information.—Mr. George L. Cochran, Pittsburgh, Pa., sends in the following pathetic plea for information: "Having been a regular visitor at the moving picture shows of my town, also being interested in good workmanship on the part of the operator, I take the liberty of addressing you, asking some information in relation thereto. Through a friend of mine, an operator, I have been enabled to read some of your articles in the Moving Picture World, and judge from same that you require too much at the hands of an operator, since from your viewpoint he should be an optician, mathematician, mechanic, electrician and what-not in order to be competent. If he is to acquire this knowledge from a correspondence school, why not pay a trifle more, go a step higher and become competent at either one of the above-named vocations. He would then be able to earn more, as well as work in more congenial places, to say nothing of shorter hours he would be required to work. Can a man be considered incompetent because he is not able to figure on paper how to measure the focal length of lenses and how to determine the size of lens required to project a given sized picture at a given distance, both moving picture and stereo? To my mind this is entirely up to the man who deals in equipment. The uppermost question is, however, as to whether or no a man should go a step further in his studies, as before indicated, I would be pleased to have you answer. Also I would like to know if a man should be required to know thoroughly the practical end of equipment and know all the technical electrical terms to be a competent operator."

First and foremost, I wish to remark that friend Cochran reads my articles "by someone's courtesy." He isn't a subscriber of the paper whose articles he presumes to criticise! In the second place he is NOT an operator, therefore not quite competent, I suspect, to butt very strongly into matters concerning practical operating. Nevertheless I shall answer, since his queries raise a question as to how far the operator should perfect himself in knowledge of matters pertaining directly to projection. I should also like readers of the Column to set forth their views on this important matter.

Answering Mr. Cochran: Yes, if knowledge of light and lenses, in-so-far as relates to the projection of pictures, makes one an "optician" then the operator must be one. I suspect, however, that the man who started in to earn his bread as an optician, equipped only with that amount of lore, would discover that the "step" friend C. speaks so glibly of really would amount to several long, high jumps. If ability to figure out a few simple problems in additions, subtraction, multiplication and division makes one a mathematician, then most surely the operator must be one, but—see what is said about long jumps above. As to being an electrician, well, the competent operator has to go pretty far along that particular road, that is a fact, and naturally he must to some extent be a mechanic. I believe I have said nothing at all as to the operator acquiring his knowledge through a correspondence school, though I may possibly have said such a course would be benficial and worth all it would cost. No, I would not call a man incompetent simply because he could not figure lenses—neither would I consider him fully competent. As to that "step further" matter I would simply say that such talk is mere foolishness. But I'll say no more just now, as I want to hear from readers of the column regarding their views as to how far operators should go in the matter of acquiring knowledge. My own is, as you all know, that the operator should learn all he possibly can and that the more knowledge he has the more competent he is. Also that the man who is satisfied with anything less than the best knowledge he can possibly obtain of his vocation is too shiftless to make any large success in anything under the sun.

Position Wanted.—Operator, Pipestone, Minn., gives references and asks that his name be remembered should there be any call for a good man. Two men owning machines have communicated with me, one by wire and one by mail. I have forwarded their addresses to the party who asked for machine owning operators, though it is most likely too late. When I suggested that competent operators leave their names with me I meant those in or quite near New York City. I will file names from anywhere in the country, but as the distance from New York increases, the likelihood of results decreases, since when one wants an operator one wants him, as a rule, without much delay.

Condensers.—Milt. C. Hagan, Utica, N. Y., writes: "I notice in the Operator's Column that some of the men are having trouble breaking condensers. Well, I had my own troubles, too, until I tried out a little idea of my own, which ended it. That was six or seven months ago, and I haven't broken a single condenser since. Before that I broke an even dozen in one week, and it is said that necessity is the mother of invention. I conceived the idea that perhaps the glass did not have sufficient temper, so I laid several lenses on top of the rheostat and let them heat and cool for three or four days. I have not broken a single condenser lens since. I only hope my brother operators will try this scheme with equal success."

Surely, if this works out, and it costs nothing at all to test, we are all deeply indebted to Brother Hagan. Will others test this matter and report. By the way, Neighbor Hagan writes that the house where he was employed closed (presumably for the summer) last Saturday. He wishes employment, in Western or Middle New York or Pennsylvania. Describes himself as careful, sober and reliable, with six years' experience with Powers and Edison machines. Friend Hagan has ideas, as is above shown, therefore should be a good man. His address furnished on application. He has worked in one house for five seasons. He will furnish references.

Formostat.—Some weeks since I answered an inquiry from the West, by a man who was using a "Formostat." I told him I was unacquainted with that particular transformer. I am now in receipt of a circular, unaccompanied by letter, setting forth the alleged merits of the machine. It gives eight amperages, change from one to the other being made by merely lifting something that looks like a wire (in the picture) from one notch to another while lamp is burning.

The exhibitors were appealing to the finer senses instead of jarring them. It was now up to the pictures to make good.

Makers claim it will stand short circuit of lamp leads for hours without overheating or will stand 100 per cent. overvoltage with no bad effect at all—pretty large claims, it strikes me, though not impossible of fulfillment.

Operating Room, St. Paul, Minn., writes: "We are about remodeling our house. Have ample room for operating booth. Wish to have the best. We enclose sketch and elevation of interior of auditorium. Will you kindly draw sketch of operating booth, floor plan and elevation, with locations of necessary openings for two machines, a spotlight and dissolver. Kindly give full and complete data in form, so that architect can comprehend and forward same by express, C. O. D. amount of your bill."

The sketch and elevation showed, as intimated, ample room. Aside from the sketch forwarded, I advised as follows: Build walls of three or four-inch hollow tiles, set in rich cement mortar, with longitudinal grounds of ½-inch soft wood between each joint, beginning three feet from floor and ending seven feet from floor, same being to receive screws holding shelf brackets, etc., etc. Openings in walls (lens holes, lookout holes, etc.) to be finished in very rich cement mortar. Interior of walls to be plastered with patent hard plaster, locations of grounds to be marked with small nail at either end of each ground. Ceiling to be fireproofed by tile construction or in other approved manner and floor to be covered with layer of macadam three inches thick, finished with top dressing of cement, or instead of foregoing, the whole room to be fireproofed by asbestos millboard ¼ to ⅜ inches thick, securely fastened to proper backing. From center of ceiling a vent flue of sheet metal, two feet in diameter, to extend through, and three feet above roof, terminating in suitable protecting hood. Machine lookout holes to be 12x18 inches in size, located at height so that operator will just see bottom of picture when seated in operating position. All openings to be fitted with sliding shutters so arranged that all will drop on pulling a single peg. Size of room to be 8 by 18 feet, with ceiling as high as possible—the higher the better. Rheostats, or transformers to set on shelf of marble or slate, with marble or slate slab next wall, but away one inch therefrom. Proper locker for each operator to be built into wall as well as supply cupboard. The above outlines the more important points contained in matter sent St. Paul. It is published for the reason that it may prove of benefit to others planning operating rooms. The asbestos mill board is excellent fireproofing, but is exceedingly hard to work. Once you get it on, however, it makes a splendid job. Sheet iron backed by asbestos may also be used, but I cannot recommend it for high class, permanent work.

Trouble Found.—Some time since it will be remembered a correspondent, Iowa, I think it was, complained that every time a figure in his picture moved it would blur. It was a case which had the editor puzzled, and at the time no satisfactory solution was found. It now develops that the machine was finally sent to the factory and the star was found to be loose on the shaft. Just why this should produce this particular effect is not quite clear,—but it did.

New Song-Slide Box.—Gentry & Humphreys, Wallace, Idaho, send in description and pictures of their new song-slide shipment box. It consists of four grooved compartments in which the slides are held apart from each other, thus doing away with danger of breakage and packing. The slides are simply slipped into the grooves, the box closed and it is ready to go. The package for twenty slides is 3½ inches deep, 7½ wide and 9½ long. The sole right to manufacture is for sale or they will consider a proposition of royalty, the sum named being five cents per box. The box seems far superior to the old style shipping box, and we wish Messrs. Gentry & Humphreys all success. Bye the bye, if Dave Coates, Editor, is still in Wallace, kindly say hello to him for me.

Film Buckling.—Rosedale, Miss., writes that a certain make (one of the best manufacturers we have) of film buckles, or gets out of focus every few inches. I have written the makers of the films in question, Rosedale. Frankly, you have "got" me. If other films run all right in your machine I can imagine no possible reason why the ——— should not also. Still, I have heard the same complaint once before. Therefore I have written the manufacturer, since it may be possibly due to some peculiarity in the finish of the stock. More later.

A Red Hot One on Salt Lake City.—From Salt Lake City comes a letter roasting the performances seen in that village to a brown turn. The letter tells of its writer visiting several picture shows, in one of which the machine was motor driven, the operator sitting by the window reading a book, with yellow shadows half way up the curtain more than fifteen minutes at a stretch. Another turned the crank by hand, but was talking to some one, his head turned away, while the picture remained out of frame almost ten minutes. The writer says that if those men be called good operators he never wants to see a poor one (right, brother). The writer of the letter continues as follows: "I think every operator should understand thoroughly the theory of electricity and gas and be able to define their units. The operator while running should watch his picture continually, keep his focus sharp, allow no shadows at all on the screen. He should be able to do small mechanical jobs such as confront one in the operating room." How about this, Salt Lake City? I haven't set forth all that the letter contained by any means. I know your ten acre blocks and wide, shady streets, with white poles down their centers, well, for I ran an Rio Grand Western engine out of your city in 1889. Can it be possible that conditions set forth in the letter are true. Let us hear from you; also let us hope it will be honest denial and not excuses.

NEW OFFICES FOR HALLBERG.

J. H. Hallberg, formerly of No. 28-30 Greenwich Ave., New York City, has taken a long lease on the fourth floor of No. 36 East 23d St., which is one of the most convenient and desirable places for theatrical and moving picture managers and operators to reach. Mr. Hallberg expects to be fully established sometime before the 1st of August, and the arrangement of his offices and show room will be the most modern, and will be particularly instructive and useful to operators, because Mr. Hallberg will make a full display of every electrical and mechanical device for the theater. There will be shown new and novel current saving devices and the latest in the moving picture machine line, and a large and complete stock of supplies, carbons, etc., will always be on hand at the lowest market prices.

A complete stock of repair parts will also be carried for all standard machines. A complete working exhibit of the "Hallberg" incandescent lighting system with economizer will also be subject to inspection. The building is provided with the most modern passenger and freight elevator service, and everybody is invited to call.

The New York State Law in Regard to M. P. Machines.—The legislature at Albany has passed a new law governing the licensing of motion picture operators in Greater New York. The Editor of this journal has been asked many times, both orally and by letter, what are the provisions of the new statute. For the benefit of all and sundry it is printed in full:

AN ACT

To Amend the Greater New York Charter, in Relation to Licensing Operators of Moving Picture Apparatus and its Connections.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. The Greater New York charter, as re-enacted by chapter four hundred and sixty-six of the laws of nineteen hundred and one, is hereby amended by adding, after section five hundred and twenty-nine, a new section, to be section five hundred and twenty-nine-a thereof, to read as follows:

NO PERSON TO OPERATE MOVING PICTURE APPARATUS AND ITS CONNECTIONS WITHOUT A LICENSE.

Sec. 529-a. It shall not be lawful for any person or persons to operate any moving picture apparatus and its connections in the city of New York unless such person or persons so operating such apparatus is duly licensed as hereinafter provided. Any person desiring to act as such operator shall make application for a license to so act to the Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity of the city of New York, who shall furnish to each applicant blank forms of application which the applicant shall fill out.

The Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity shall make rules and regulations governing the examination of applicants and the issuance of licenses and certificates.

The applicant shall be given a practical examination under the direction of the Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, and if found competent as to his ability to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections, shall receive within six days after such examination a license as herein provided. Such license may be revoked or suspended at any time by the Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity. Every license shall continue in force for one year from the date of issue, unless sooner revoked or suspended. Every license, unless revoked or suspended, as herein provided, may at the end of one year from the date of issue thereof be renewed by the Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity in his discretion upon application and with or without further examination, as said Commissioner may direct. Every application for renewal of license must be made within the thirty days previous to the expiration of such license. With every license granted there shall be issued to every person obtaining such license a certificate, made by the Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, or such other officer as such Commissioner may designate, certifying that the person named therein is duly authorized to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections. Such certificate shall be displayed in a conspicuous place in the room where the person to whom it is issued operates moving picture apparatus and its connections. No person shall be eligible to procure a license unless he shall be a citizen of the United States and of full age. Any person offending against the provisions of this section, as well as any person who employs or permits a person not licensed as herein provided to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding the sum of one hundred dollars or imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect immediately.

As to the practical effect of the law, it amounts to the placing of the entire control of examinations and licensing in the hands of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, and forbids the licensing of any except citizens of the United States who are of full age. It is not yet decided, however, whether in case of foreign born citizens, first papers will be accepted, this point having been referred to the Attorney General for an opinion. It is my understanding that there will be no radical changes in the examinations which will in future, as in the past, seek to determine the applicants qualification, or lack of it, as the case may be, by a fair, practical test.

The Church and the Moving Picture.

WHICH IS THE MOST MORAL PLACE OF THE TWO?

Heard Around the Lobbies by J. M. B.

Mr. Ehibitor—The clergy with the newspapers and others of the enemies of cinematography have waged such a hard fight, taking for an excuse the fight pictures, that the industry will be ruined unless we put our shoulder to the cart and once for all denounce our enemies, show them up as they should be.

WHAT THE CHILDREN SAY.

The Church.

John:—Say, Mary, why did you go to sleep at church?

Mary:—Oh, the preacher made me sleepy with his long, dry words; and in the name of common sense, why don't they call the folks of the bible, Charley, Jim or Tom, instead of using all these names so hard to memorize. What was it? Nack-ha-bu-naz-arr. What a name to make you sleep. On the day of rest they should not force us to work so hard with such names.

John:—Why, I don't go to Sunday School to listen to the preacher, but for the fun. If you had not been sleeping, you would have laughed at our teacher, he could scarcely keep awake, and every time that he dropped his head to dream I sent him a little bullet with my blow-pipe.

Mary:—What a wicked boy you are.

John:—No; I was rendering a service to the school, otherwise our dear teacher would have snored to wake up the whole class.

Mary:—What did you do to Jim that he pulled so hard on me?

John:—Jim wanted to sleep and I called him back to his senses with the point of a pin.

Mary:—Well, if you had your fun I was mad. I had said to mother that I could not go to Sunday School because I had such a bad headache, but she told me not to miss the school as she knew that Catherine would be there with her new French dress; but this stupid of dolly did not show up.

John:—Did you drop your nickel in the basket?

Mary:—I made believe that I was fast asleep when the basket passed. And did you drop it?

John:—Never on your life. A nickel means 10 cigarettes and I am always provided with enough pants buttons to drop in the basket.

Mary:—I bet you that this old miser of sexton collects your pants buttons and sells them.

John:—I would be surprised at nothing from these church rats.

The Moving Picture Theater.

Jimmy:—Mother, dear, can I pick some flowers in the garden?

Mother:—What do you want to do with them?

Jimmy:—I want to take them to this poor sick little girl in the back alley.

Mother:—What is the matter with you, my boy, to be so thoughtful of others?

Jimmy:—Well, mama, you gave me a nickel last evening and I went to the moving picture show. There I saw a wonderful story.

Mother:—What was the story?

Jimmy:—A poor boy is sent on a farm by the Fresh Air Fund. There he has a bully time, but he remembers a sick little friend and when he returns home he carries with him many good things for the sick.

Mother:—It was very kind on the part of the boy to remember the afflicted little girl.

Jimmy:—Yes, mother, but it made me feel cheap.

Mother:—So you profited by the lesson and you want to try to imitate the good little boy?

Jimmy:—Yes, mother. If you allow me to pick a few flowers for our sick neighbor I am sure that the sight of the flowers will bring a little sunshine in her soul and I will feel well rewarded if I can bring a little smile on her thin face.

Mother:—You are a good boy. I am very much pleased to see you think of others and this will be the best news for your father, when he will return from his work. Yes, my son, you can pick some flowers for the sick little girl, and while you are in the garden I will prepare you a basket of good things

Jimmy:—Thanks, mother, dear. How happy the sick child will be and how happy will be the poor mother to receive these good things.

Mother (alone):—I feel humiliated to be taught a lesson by my own boy. I should have thought of this poor afflicted family. And they say that moving pictures are bad. No; they have not corrupted my boy, but made a little man out of him

WHAT THE WOMEN SAY.

The Church.

Mrs. White:—Well, my dear, what do you think of our minister? Is he not a grand preacher? And so handsome.

Mrs. Smith:—What a foolish question. You know well that I do not go to church to hear the sermon. I go to see the fashions.

Mrs. White:—And to keep our social standing. Although I take very little interest in his sermons, I must tell you that you cannot find a finer man, so well educated, so polite, it is a pleasure to visit him.

Mrs. Smith:—And you should say so fascinating, as you seem to have a little fancy for this man of good manners. Does he visit the poor?

Mrs. White:—Certainly, and I generally accompany him; but you know we cannot go right in the slums, it would be too degrading for a man of his standing.

Mrs. Smith:—As others, you leave this slum work to the Salvation Army.

Mrs. White:—Certainly. The salvationists are recruited in the low classes, it is natural for them to do the slum work. But what is the matter with you, that you cannot find a kind word for our young preacher?

Mrs. Smith:—Well, to tell you the truth, my dear, I am mad. Did you see your neighbor, this Mrs. Black?

Mrs. White:—She is very wealthy; she is a pillar of this church, but, mercy, she does not know how to dress. Put on her the finest dresses and she looks like a pack of rags.

Mrs. Smith. That is why I am so mad. When Madam Ladijon made me my dress she told me that no one else would have the same pattern, and I see your Mrs. Black with the identical same dress. It is an outrage.

Mrs. White:—I see now. Because you were so absorbed in looking at Mrs. Black you could not see the good manners of our preacher. You must cool down and not be jealous, as Mrs. Black has not your poise, and what looks lovely on you looks like nothing on her. Then did you notice her bad taste, to have with a light blue dress such an extra large hat trimmed in dark green and red. She is truly a parvenue.

Mrs. Smith:—When you talk of hats I think that women who cannot pay their bills, like this old Miss Demijohn, should not make such a show of extra large ostrich feathers.

The Moving Pictures.

Mrs. Jones:—I was down town and I certainly enjoyed a fine moving picture show.

Mrs. Brown:—I always enjoy a moving picture show, but my husband always reprimands me.

Mrs. Jones:—If both our husbands had witnessed the show of to-day, a wonderful Biograph production, they would give us a little more of their time and not kill themselves at making money, as the picture of to-day proves to us that happiness is not in wealth.

Mrs. Brown:—I bet the picture you saw to-day is named, "Gold is Not All," of the Biograph Company.

Mrs. Jones:—Yes, that is the title. In this picture we find a finely drawn parallel of the rich and of the poor. The poor envies the rich, while the rich has nothing to be envied for. The wealthy pair starts on a journey full of thorns and of disappointments, with a selfish and loveless existence. The poor pair has at least that great gift of filial and parental love. Clouds are over the household of the rich, while sunshine bathes the humble home of the poor.

Mrs. Brown:—I was deeply touched with such a story, and although it was sad to see the rich mother lose her only child, while the poor parents have lovely affectionate children, I could not but say to myself that it was true

Mrs. Jones:—And to say that this Miss Somebody is always talking against moving pictures and claim that they debase our children.

Mrs. Brown:—You should have mercy on Miss Somebody, she is an old maid, she would rather nurse and play with her cat than with a baby and you know she is from this very saintly place called Boston.

Mrs. Jones:—Yes, I know she comes from Boston and I know that she was there some twenty years ago and a leader in a war waged by the good Christians of Bosto to prevent the cooks from boiling the lobsters alive. Yes, they had arrests made and it was a great conflict.

Mrs. Brown:—Lobsters scarcely suffer when they are thrown in a pot of boiling water—their agony cannot last one minute.

Mrs. Jones:—We know this and this is why folks made a ridicule of this great sympathy for lobsters. But hear what the good folks of Boston did. At the same time when they wanted to Mrs White:—This is the trouble in this tony neighborhood, we have too many persons living above their means. Our dear preacher knows them all and when he wants some money he knows where to go, too.

Mrs Smith:—Why is it that Mrs Springs did not shake hands with your minister?

Mrs White:—She is from an old aristocratic family, but ruined by her foolish husband. As she is stuck on etiquette, not very congenial and not in a financial position to support the church, our pastor cannot waste much time on her, consequently she is spiteful.

Mrs. Smith:—Has she not a soul to save?

Mrs. White:—Have we any time to think of our souls in this high social turmoil? If we had to take religion seriously we would have to close our houses and dress ourselves like nuns.

Mrs. Smith:—Yes, the church is nothing else than the Sunday social parlor.

WHAT THE MEN SAY.

The Church.

Smith:—What is the trouble with your pastor, he badly knocked Curran?

White:—Our pastor is a paid man, he preaches to please his congregation.

Smith:—You mean to say that your pastor will gladly expose members of another faith and pass under silence the sins of his flock?

White:—Yes, such is our pastor.

Smith:—Then why do you go to church?

White:—By mere necessity and convenience. It pays me to go to church, it even pays me to hire the best pew and to give freely. We are a certain light in this neighborhood and it would be impossible for my wife to keep up her social functions if we were not seen every Sunday in our pew. I am considered some one because I am a regular church member.

Smith:—Do you mean to say that it advertises your business?

White:—Without a doubt. Many of our neighbors would never visit my store, never pay me my prices, if I was not a pillar of this church. I pay no attention to the sermon. I come here to advertise myself. I am well thought of and, although the pastor knows that I play cards, even on Sunday, that liquor is sent to me by the back door, etc., he would never dare say of me what he said of Curran. Our pastor is a wise guy, he likes too much protect the dear lobsters, they had a murderer in jail, a man that was to be hanged. It seems that the day previous to the execution this condemned man secured a razor and so badly slashed his throat that if help had not arrived he would have died in a few minutes. The folks who had such sympathy for the poor lobsters could not miss the chance of having a man hang at the end of a rope, so the Governor quickly respited the man to give a chance to the best doctors to fix the neck of the murderer. This murderer would have enjoyed to be a lobster, for if he had been one they would have allowed him to bleed for a couple of minutes longer and it would have been the end. He was not a lobster but a brother, and human beings do not deserve the sympathy of the good Christians.

Mrs. Brown:—These are the folks that want to kill moving pictures.

The Moving Pictures.

Jones:—I did not see you last evening.

Brown:—No, I was detained down town and I went to a moving picture show.

Jones:—What, a moving picture show; do you patronize such immoral places?

Brown:—At one time I had the same bad opinion; in fact I was so opposed to moving pictures that I had more than a row with my wife for her letting the boys go to such places.

Jones:—I think too much of my reputation to go to such places and you will never convert me. Look at this fuss on the fight pictures.

Brown:—This fuss on the fight pictures is nothing else than spite work and a political game on the part of the ministers and newspapers.

Jones:—You are getting to be quite an eloquent preacher. Who converted you, may I ask?

Brown:—Selfass invited me to take supper with him and after he took me to a moving picture theater and I was not sorry of it.

Jones:—What did you see there? A man assaulting a woman? A murder? A burglary? What can you see in such places?

Brown:—You can see things that talk to your heart, that give you a good lesson, that help to make better men and women. I saw a French picture. The title was, "Love Ye One Another."

Jones:—With such a title I has comfort to have me against him. You know that my wife is of the committee to see that the pastor is well taken care of and my money has paid many of the good things found in the parsonage. Curran is a member of another faith, and as he refused to make a reduction on a bill of goods supplied by his firm for one of the entertainments, the pastor is getting even with him by denouncing him as a card player and a drunkard.

Smith:—When you invited me to go to your church I was a little ashamed of myself, as I had not been in a church for over 20 years.

White:—You are as well off, because out of the church you can retain certain illusions, while on another hand, you lose entire confidence when you see what is going on in what they call the house of God. Just wait a minute, I hear these ladies coming down and you will be edified when you hear them talk of what they saw at the church.

Smith:—In this case you will not get me to go with you this evening.

White:—Beg your pardon. You will have to accompany us to church; you are our guest and it is obligatory for us to give you the good example. We would be sharply criticized for not taking our guests to church.

Smith:—Are we still under slavery?

White:—Yes; under social slavery. The poor does not know how happy he is.

see that it was a religious mockery.

Brown:—Not on your life! It was no mockery, but it was to me the revelation of our daily injustice towards the poor fellow.

Jones:—Well you know that these beggars do not want work.

Brown:—I was under the same impression because I had been misled by the so-called charitable institutions who warn us to pay no attention to these beggars, but to turn them to their societies. What are these so-called charitable institutions doing? They employ a big force of loafers, men and women who would not do an honest day's work, and to keep this army of loafers on the pay roll, the charitable societies invent all the red tape they can to drag the cases, and a man really starving has the chance to die several times before he can get help. In the said picture we see a man out of work, he begs, he asks for work, he is willing to do anything, but he is turned down like a good for nothing. Was he a good for nothing? No. The last scene shows us the farm buildings burning down and the only man with enough courage to save some precious lives is the beggar, the man that everyone turned down. Is it not a strong moral lesson to mankind? Is it not better than the finest dry sermon? Pictures talk to our senses, while too often the words of the minister are as dry as an empty well.

MIRROR SCREEN IN NEW YORK CITY.

Through the efforts of Tuck & Manning, 406 Gaiety Theater Building, New York City, who represent the mirror screen in this part of the country, one has been installed in the Varieties Theater, 112 Third avenue, just below Fourteenth street. The Varieties Theater is owned and operated by the Goodwin & Hartel Amusement Company, Harry Hartel being the active manager. They certainly deserve credit and the praise of the Moving Picture World as being the first theater in New York to make a large investment simply for the purpose of giving their patrons a better picture.

Mr. Porter, of the Mirror Screen Company, who superintended the installation of the screen, remarked that New York was yet a town of horse cars and antediluvian ideas. He is right in-so-far as the West can show us really fine moving picture theaters. In Chicago five mirror screens were installed in one week and they can be found in many small Western towns.

But "New York has woke up," as Mr. Porter says, and if theater managers do not appreciate the demonstration which Mr. Hartel is always ready to give, it is because they are wilfully blind. We would be accused of partiality if we say more, but our readers will be well repaid by a visit to the Varieties, at 112 Third avenue.

Messrs. Tuck & Manning will be pleased to arrang demonstrations and quote prices to exhibitors who are interested in giving their patrons the best possible picture.

GENERAL FIGHT PICTURE CO. (Not Inc.)
Mossler Building, CHICAGO

Fabian, the celebrated comedian, who has been much sought by the continental film manufacturers, was recently employed by the Great Northern Film Company and is now in their employ, appearing in their comedy productions with the greatest of success. His antics are irresistible, his humor genuine and his facial expressions extremely comical. His debut before the American public will no doubt be appreciated to the fullest extent as he cannot fail to amuse. To see him is to grin, laugh and roar.

REPRODUCTION OF THE FIGHT.

A most realistic and exact reproduction of the original fight between the two world's champions, Johnson and Jeffries, which took place at Reno, Nevada, on July 4th, and upon which much comment pro and con had been freely versed, was taken by the Sports Picture Company of Chicago recently at Forest Park. All ringside celebrities were impersonated so as to lend local color to the production. Each incident occurring in the original fight was exactly re-enacted by the two competent fighters, Charles Cutler, of Chicago, who represented Jeffries, and Cleve Hawkins, of New York, who capably took the part of the colored champion.

It was not the idea of the producers of this picture to effect a fake, but to realistically show each and every action as it occurred in the real fight at Reno, which idea was most cleverly carried out to the most minute detail. A large crowd being present for the taking of the picture greatly enhanced the exactness of this representation.

The CALL TO ARMS.—No period of the world's history is so attractive as the Mediaeval. It was so fraught with picturesque romance that the mere mention conjures up thoughts of brave warriors, noble women, love and sacrifice. But as in every other time the good had always to battle with the evil. The moral of this Biograph production is the powerful influence of covetousness. When cupidity is aroused there is seldom any counteracting element in the human make-up strong enough to dispel it. Hence it was that when the Feudal Lord and his bride were visited by their cousin at a time when this Lord was presenting to his bride the family heirloom—the Great Ruby of Iskeat—the cousin coveted it, and was determined to secure it. The Lord receives a call to arms, and in this the cousin sees a way to achieve his design. The Lord, however, appreciating the danger of leaving this valuable jewel unguarded, buries it in a secluded part of the grounds. His soldiers now assembled, he departs, leaving his wife to the care of his trusted servants. No sooner had he left than the cousin returns with the subterfuge that he will stay at the palace guarding the wife until the Lord's return. This the wife at first appreciates, believing his tender well meant. Surreptitiously he rids the palace of the servants, placing his own in their stead. The poor woman is now in the absolute power of this despicable villain. By entreaties and threats he tries to make her divulge the whereabouts of the ruby, but he finds her adamant. Not wishing to use violence, he will pursue another course—flattery and wine. While he gets the wine, the wife writes a note and dispatches her page, whom she discovers in the garden beneath her window, to her husband with it. Off the page goes on a mad dash only to become exhausted before the end of the journey. Meeting a band of gypsies they give the boy refreshments. The drink induces sleep and when the boy awakes he finds several hours have elapsed. Arriving at the Lord's tent, he delivers the missive and the Lord leaps into the saddle and dashes toward the palace. During the time of this wild ride, a horrible thing has happened at the palace. In her endeavor to keep the traiterous cousin at bay the wife has accidentally fallen headlong from one of the parapets of the palace to the walk below. Out rushes the cousin, only to find that the fall resulted fatally. He carries her inanimate form in, and now he fully realizes the enormity of his deed and falls cowering at the foot of the altar in the little chapel. At this moment the Lord dashes up. Entering, he finds his wife cold in death. Stunned for a moment, he rushes into the next room, where the cousin grovels, with one object in mind—vengeance.

UNEXPECTED HELP.—We should not place too much confidence in our will power, by going too close to the edge of propriety, feeling sure of our power of resistance. While the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak, but our will may most times whip the flesh to be submissive to the spirit; still conditions may occur to make us helpless tools of our inclinations. Hence, absolute avoidance is safer than power of resistance. John Bradley is a trusted clerk with an oil company. Enjoying a fair salary, he is comfortably fixed in a modest little village home with his wife and two small children. Starting from home in the morning he is accompanied by the two little ones, who always looked forward to each morning's scamper in the hills with pleasurable anticipation. He is met at the office door by the manager and handed a large sum of money with instructions to carry it to the bank. This is witnessed by a well known gambler of the town, who being in hard luck, resolves to get that money by hook or crook. Making a short cut across the little town, he manages to intercept John on his way to the bank, and in the course of their conversation invites him to have a drink, as it is half an hour before the bank opens. The invitation is accepted and while in the saloon the gambler tries to inveigle John into a game, but here his will serves him and he resists the fascination. However, he drinks at the serving of the gambler and is the next moment sitting helpless in a chair. The drink was "fixed." When he awakes they all pretend he lost the money at the card table. The influence of the gambler makes this story believed even by the United States marshal to whom he appeals. The poor wife is beside herself with grief when John tells of his misfortune, so she goes about the town imploring her friends' aid in her husband's behalf. They, of course, have heard such stories before, and give her little heed until she meets the parish priest and his assistant. They listen to her tale of woe, and having on them pistols, which they carry for protection while passing over the hills, feel sure of getting at the truth of the situation with these terrifying implements. Making their way to the saloon, they take the gambler unawares. Under the menace of these two big six-shooters his hands go up, and while his assistant and the wife hold the guns the old priest searches the gambler, regaining the purse of money intact. This the wife joyously carries to her husband, who takes it off to bank. The old priest, however, admonishes John, warning him to avoid such chances in the future. It is needless to say that John has learned a lesson.

EDISON MFG. CO.

LAZY FARMER BROWN. One day Brown visits the country fair to buy some smoking tobacco. To the amusement of the farmers and idlers gathered about, after completing his purchase he stretches himself out comfortably beside a bottle, and with his head resting upon a convenient cattle-peer gradually falls asleep. While Brown is slumbering a bright idea strikes one of the farmers. Borrowing a piece of cloth from the storekeeper he writes on it a notice, made the more impressive by a crudely drawn representation of a skull and cross bones, to the effect that in 1709 Captain Kidd had buried near this spot a chest of treasure. Going to Brown's farm the village wags bury the cloth near the log on which Brown takes his frequent siestas.

The next day, in passing by the place on a pretended fishing trip, they ask Brown to allow them to dig for bait, which permission is lazily granted. One of them finds the rag with the inscription on it, and waking Brown from his nap, they show it to him. The effect is magical. Brown seizes a mattock and begins to dig vigorously among the weeds to the intense delight of the farmers, who see their scheme working to perfection. After digging for some time Brown is almost exhausted and, concluding that he will take a little rest, he stretches out and promptly falls asleep on his favorite log.

While asleep he dreams that Captain Kidd and his pirate crew visit the spot and point out where the chest is hidden. He suddenly wakes, grasps his mattock, and with redoubled energy attacks the ground. The farmers return about this time to enjoy again the sight of lazy Brown working like a madman. Suddenly Brown's mattock strikes something hard in the ground, and to the amazement and chagrin of his friends and the unbounded joy of himself and his wife he brings forth an old treasure chest filled to overflowing with gold, jewels and silver plate.

PEG WOFFINGTON.—Two men, Sir Charles Pomander and Ernest Vane, both fall in love with Peg at the same time. Pomander's offer, on account of the manner in which it is made, Peg resents as an insult. Vane's, on the other hand, is agreeable to her, for she falls desperately in love with this handsome young country gentleman.

All goes well, and Peg things Vane's love is honorable and that he intends to make her his wife. Great then is her surprise when, at a banquet given in her honor at Vane's home, Mrs. Vane unexpectedly arrives. Peg, not knowing who she is, and seeing the strange woman rush into the arms of her suitor, asks: "Who is this woman?" This is my wife" is the reply which transfixes Peg as if she were struck by a thunderbolt. Mrs. Vane asks her husband to introduce her to the company and he tries to give some excuse. Peg, concealing her feelings beneath a brave air, steps into the breach and introduces the entire assemblage, saving the day for Vane and permitting the company to withdraw gracefully. Vane tries to explain matters to Peg and suggests that they elope, but she spurns him and his offer. Pomander, seeing the breach between Vane and his pretty, charming wife, attempts to make love to the latter and receives from her the same treatment that Vane did from Peg.

In his anger Pomander tells Mrs. Vane of the attentions which her husband has paid to the famous actress, Peg Woffington. He then withdraws. As Mrs. Vane is about to leave the room Peg and Vane enter. They do not see her as she is in the doorway. Vane is pleading with Peg to go away with him. The scene is interrupted by Mrs. Vane coming toward her husband and, after upbraiding him, fainting in the midst of her angry outburst. Peg views the scene before her with mingled emotions. She still loves Vane, though she has rejected him, and sneers somewhat at the sentiment of the wife.

We next see Peg in the green room of a theater trying to study the lines of her part. Mrs. Vane is ushered in and pleads with Peg to give up her husband. Peg at first is inclined to be cold, and the other woman sobs in her despair. Peg is moved to pity and, taking Mrs. Vane in her arms, she promises that she will help her. The question now is how a reconciliation can be effected between Vane and his wife. A brilliant idea suggests itself to the mind of Peg. She writes a letter to Pomander under Mrs. Vane's signature, in which she asks him to meet her (Mrs. Vane) at the rooms of Triplet, the playwright, at two o'clock the following day. Mrs. Vane objects to the sending of this note until Peg explains the nature of the trick. Peg writes another letter to Vane, telling him that if he wishes to save scandal to his name he will be at the rooms of Triplet the following day at two o'clock. This letter is signed, "A Friend."

Mrs. Vane now becomes a willing confederate of Peg's. Triplet, by the way, is a poor playwright with whom Peg has made an appointment to read one of his tragedies. His home is in a garret, and Peg comes there the next day before two o'clock for a reading of the play. We see the generosity and bounty of Peg in the way in which she relieves the distress of Triplet, his wife and children, and makes the poor man happy, for the moment at least. When Triplet finishes reading his tragedy Peg expresses her delight with it, and indicates to him and Henry lies himself off to the bedroom to make ready for the meeting in the afternoon.

Dragging out his checked suit and derby hat he hurries to the kitchen puts an iron on the stove and proceeds to make creases in the trousers. His wife, however, is unable to contain her surprise and goes out to purchase a newspaper which contains the personal.

During her absence Henry busies himself giving up his clothes, but as he is in the midst of this process the telephone bell rings and he rushes out to answer it. While he is gone a tramp crawls into the kitchen, purloins the suit, the derby hat and other of Henry's attire and makes away with them.

Henry returns and finds the suit gone and realizing that he cannot now keep the appointment, he dons his business suit and goes to his office.

The tramp in the meantime has found the personal in the coat of the light checked suit and resolves to keep the appointment with the lady himself. But at the appointed time Mrs. Henry comes on the scene and what follows is said to excite the tramp. Henry has come on the scene and rescues his frustrated wife from the police, after she has discovered that the gentleman in the checked suit is not her inconstant Henry. The tramp, however, does not get away so easily, and after restoring the clothes to Henry he is taken away by various officers of the law.

BRONCHO BILLY'S REDEMPTION. — Broncho Billy, our hero in this instance, is a bad man of the first water, cattle rustler, black knight of the road, and his depredations number countless midnight raids on stray cattle bunches, stage wood-ups in lonesome mountain passes, and a few "shooting-up" affairs. However, Billy's record is getting too strong for even the sheriff of the county and a posse is organized to take the bad man in his lair. Yet Billy does not lack friends, as is evidenced by the following note from an unknown friend:

Friend Broncho:

The Vigilantes Committee suspect you of cattle rustling. The sheriff is on your trail. You will stretch a hemp if you are caught.

A FRIEND.

Words go a long way in the West, and Billy who has received the note at his shack, hurriedly saddles his pony and rides away.

An hour later he draws rein at a prairie schooner outfit, pulled up under the trees of a little grove, the horses cropping the grass round about and a sweet faced young girl cooking coffee over a campfire. In the wagon an old man is lying and he is informed by the girl that her "daddy" is sick. She offers Broncho a cup of coffee which he accepts with thanks, then mounts into his saddle and hurries on his way.

We return again to Millie Merrill, the girl of the prairie schooner, who has broken camp, hooked up the horses and is driving away. As evening comes on, Millie halts at the door of a shack, unbeknown, investigates and finds it will prove habitable and more comfortable for her sick father. The latter has grown constantly worse and his exertion in getting out of the wagon has used up all his little strength. He drops in a heap on the shanty floor, and the girl, apprehensive and worried, goes to the door and looks out. Just then Broncho Billy rides into view, she signals him, and turning his horse he hurries up to her. She explains, when they enter the shack, that her father is in a very grave condition, that they are without medicine, and begs him to ride to town and fill her prescription. Broncho Billy realizes that to return to town will mean his capture and death and he tells her so. However he takes the prescription and says that if he cannot find another messenger he will go himself.

Billy rides off and comes across a Mexican. He explains to the latter and asks him to go to town for the medicine. The Mexican's eyes twinkle when he sees the silver and he nods his head, but as Broncho Billy rides away he tears the prescription into bits, pockets the money and goes away exultantly.

Some time later Billy passes a herd of cattle and the old desire to rustle takes the better of him. But as he is stealing off with the bunch he again comes across the prairie schooner and believing something to be wrong crosses over to it. It is empty and the horses, with the lines under their feet, are cropping the grass. Broncho turns the cattle loose, dismounts from his nag and mounts the seat of the wagon. Then he drives back to the shack, pounds on the door, and receiving no answer to his knocking, he bursts down the door and finds the man and his daughter stretched out on the rough board floor, apparently unconscious. Under the intense strain of caring for her father and assuming command of the caravan, she, too, has fallen ill.

Broncho Billy curses the thieving Mexican who had stolen the money, carries the two into the wagon, and mounting the seat, whips the horses into a gallop. Some time later he draws up in town, jumps from the wagon and throws up his hands as the guns of the sheriff and his posse are leveled at his head. He indicates the wagon and the two sick persons are taken out and carried into the doctor's office. Then he turns to the sheriff and holds out his hands, but this officer of the peace hesitates about putting the handcuffs on his captive and finally ends by telling Billy he is free to go if he will promise to mend his ways. The bad man, redeemed, shakes the sheriff's hand and gives his promise.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

THE PRINCESS AND THE FISHBONE. A beautiful colored cartoon film with several novel incidents. A princess is lamentably ill, when she swallows a fishbone. The doctors endeavor to remove the obstacle, but all to no purpose. Hearing that an eminent physician is living in the woods two messengers are sent out to fetch him to. A woodcutter has been having "a few words" with a fair companion, and eventually leaves her, and she, to leave her revenge, informs the messengers that the physician is pretending to be a woodcutter, and that they will have to resort to violent measures to get him to come. Upon finding him, after some persuasion necessitating resorting to the "strong measures," they bring him to the Princess, who is rapidly croaking. Here the woodcutter again essays to convince them that he is no physician, but, compelled to do so, approaches the unhappy Princess, who suddenly laughs, thereby releasing the bone. There is general rejoicing and eventually the Princess marries the woodcutter, amid great acclaim.

THE FOXY LAWYER. We see him pouring forth his eloquence in court, nothing stopping him, not even a dry throat. After a few bouts of it, the court being in peaceful slumber, our lawyer quietly allows his client to go.

THE BEAUTIFUL MARGARET. The events that transpire in the drama are too well known to require reiteration here. All showmen and most audiboys are familiar with the story. This makes the burlesque possible, but without a common knowledge of the original drama a portion of the comedy would be lost. The various parts are played by puppets in the hands of clever and careful operators.

AN ANGLER'S DREAM.—Reciting the grotesque dreams of a fisherman who was unfortunate enough to fall asleep while enjoying the gentle sport of angling. He is captured by a school of fish and suffers at their hands (or fins is a more proper word) the very hardships they would have suffered at his in case he had been able to capture them. After torturing him in their happy, guileless, fishy way they hold deep counsel and decide to fry him in their huge spider. That is enough to wake any man. He awakens to find he has hooked a fish of such magnificent proportions that it makes away with his line.

MAKING WOODEN SHOES.—This series presents the various stages of development leading from the block of wood to the finished shoe. It is truly astonishing to note the rapid progress made by the rustic manufacturer with his exceedingly primitive tools. The method of shoeing oxen by swinging them entirely free from the ground is a novel sight to any American audience.

THE ART LOVER'S STRATEGY. -The struggles of artists are proverbial. In this case our hero, a young painter, has met with so much ill-fortune that both he and his sweet wife are in dire danger of starvation. Daily he has visited the various art stores of Paris in vain attempts to market the products of his brush. On the particular morning that our story opens the young husband starts upon his trying trip from one store to another. Now his wife, feeling she is adding to the burden he has to carry, resolves upon ending her life. Meanwhile, the husband succeeds in selling his first picture and hastens home to give his good wife the news. He arrives to find a note bidding him a fond farewell. During this time the purchaser of the painting has providentially saved the wife from suicide and takes her to his home. The wife here recognizes the picture as one made by her husband.

Then the philanthropist and his daughter plan a pleasant surprise for the young artist, presumably for the purpose of having some portrait work made. The wife is not informed of his promised visit. The meeting justifies all the care in arrangement.

MEXICAN DOMAIN. With deeply interesting views of Mexican daily life and traffic are interspersed pictures illustrating the varied recreations of a pleasure-loving people.

1. The beach of Vera Cruz. Mixed bathing. High diving, close and distant views.
2. The streets of Mexico and their traffic.
3. Parade in force of the fire brigade—engines, escapes, ladders and men.
4. A military funeral. Impressive.
5. Festival at Luna Park. State visit of the President. Imposing escort.
6. Parade of girls in white past the President and the camera.
7. Recreations at Luna Park. Dancing. Various performances. Holiday crowds. Picturesque uniforms, etc., etc.

THE SCULPTOR'S IDEAL.—Arias, a famous sculptor was in want of a model but was not able to find the particular type he desired. One day in a vision he saw the girl he wished and resolved to find her. He forthwith set out on his search. He wandered through the Gardens of Cyprus without success but at last, coming to the slave market, was presented with the model that he sought. He bought her, and hurrying home immediately commenced work upon the wonderful statue he had in his mind. A friend of his, however, calling upon him, fell in love with the maiden, and later, when in the act of declaring his love was detected by the sculptor. Arias, enraged, ordered him from the house, and returned the model to the slave market. Later the lover finds her there and [illegible]

"MAZEPPA"

or, THE WILD HORSE OF TARTARY

FROM LORD BYRON'S POEM.

An unusual dramatic offering by the Selig Polyscope Co., released July 21st. The film story is based upon absolute historical facts taken from a poem by Lord Byron. The story of this great subject has recently appeared in the columns of the World and our readers are no doubt familiar with its many sensational characteristics.

Roping the wild horse of Tartary, bringing him to subjection, that he may be the instrument of death to the despised "Mazeppa."

A vast amount of time was required to secure the proper horse, say nothing of the artist who was willing to be strapped helplessly upon the back of the animal and left to the mercies of kind providence.

The entire story is given in a manner sensational in the extreme and is destined to become very popular with the picture patrons who demand high-class film productions.

The rescue of "Mazeppa" by the Tartar Chief from the exhausted wild horse.

Following closely upon the release of "Mazeppa" comes the sensation of the age,

"RANCH LIFE IN THE GREAT SOUTHWEST"

This picture has created more actual comment and brought forth more inquiries from the great sea of exhibitors throughout the world, than any subject ever put upon the market, with possibly one or two exceptions.

B. P. O. E.

The meeting of the Grand Lodge of Elks at Detroit the past week was made in picture by the Selig Polyscope Co. and will be ready for release in a day or two. Owing to the fact that a great majority of the exhibitors are "Bills" this subject is sure to be very popular, and already over 75 per cent. of the exchanges have placed their orders, having been deluged with requests from the exhibitor. Many theater owners are arranging to feature this picture and are advertising a regular "Elk Night."

WIFIE'S MAMMA

The Longest Laugh of the Season

Perhaps you don't like to laugh but your audience does and here's just about the best laugh you've set eyes upon in a long time. It's rather short but it's just crowded with laughs, not titters or chuckles, but full throated laughter that keeps up from the second scene to the end of the little farce, with an encore laugh just as you think the fun is all over. Ask for it now and kick until you get it.

Three Hearts

Synthia promises her dying father that she will marry Jasper though Dick is the man of her choice. Jasper is in a railroad wreck and when he recovers he is not only blind but horribly scarred. That is the interesting situation developed in this fascinating play. The solution of the problem is interesting. Several novel effects are introduced and in many ways the film is a notable one.

has found employment. The women do not see her until it is too late to retreat, but they would have escaped detection even then had not the little locket that Mary had worn constantly become detached from its slender chain. Frank restores the locket and is surprised to find it the one he gave his little playmate. Explanations follow and the wrong is righted to the satisfaction of all except Mrs. Harvey and her scheming daughter.

WIFIE'S MAMMA.—The announcement that mother is coming to make a visit is hailed with delight by wifie, but that's as far as it goes, though hubby dutifully trots down to the train and makes mamma believe that she is most welcome. Mamma soon starts something with the cook and Bridget makes it plain to the mistress that she will not stay if mother does. Hubby quietly advises cook to throw mamma out of the kitchen, and after throwing her out of the culinary domain cook follows up her advantage by throwing mamma out of the second story window as well. Mamma isn't hurt, and hubby is distressed. Bridget is a good cook, and good cooks are not as plentiful as mothers-in-law, so he decides upon desperate deeds. He takes mamma out in the auto and fixes things so that she will fall out. He takes her horseback riding and makes mamma's horse run away. He takes her out on the lake and scuttles the boat, and there are other lively happenings. Mamma patiently submits to these various entertainments and saves hubby from a watery grave to boot, but at last she tears herself away and hubby is tickled to death at the results of his strategy. He is planning himself upon being one of our best little planners when a letter comes from mamma. It seems that she wanted to go home the day the cook started something, but hubby was trying so hard to make things pleasant for her that she felt she had to stay on, even though hubby was not succeeding very well. Wouldn't that upset you? It upset hubby for fair.

THE WOMAN IN THE CASE.—The West Texas Borax Company is practicaly insolvent. John Graham, the president, has been unable to find the white mineral in sufficient quantities to satisfy the eastern stockholders, and a letter from his partner arrives which brings the disagreeable news that their backers are about to back out, unless, in the language of Missouri, they "are shown" something.

Graham is in a quandary, and appeals to his stenographer for advice. That young woman has had so little to do in the office that she is overcome with surprise and confusion.

The postman enters and hands Graham a letter and a package. Listlessly the president opens them, but his manner changes and he leaps to his feet with a whoop of joy. There is a chance of saving the company, for the sample of borax is excellent and the letter which accompanies it reads: "Boraxville, Tex., July 2, 1910. President, West Texas Borax Co. Sir, am sending you sample of borax just discovered on my ranch. Will sell property at once for fair offer. Willis Johnson."

He and the stenographer rush to a map on the wall and find that Boraxville is not so far away. Graham leaves the room to prepare for his journey and a rival in business, Francis Murray, enters. He sends his card to Graham, and while the stenographer is gone he looks about the room. The sample of borax attracts his attention and he discovers the letter which Graham has carelessly left lying on the table. Hurriedly he reads this, makes up his mind to possess the property himself and, when the stenographer returns, he tells her that he has no time to wait for Graham and rushes out to secure his automobile and race to Boraxville.

The quick-witted stenographer divines the situation and tells Graham when he returns. Graham has his horse saddled and rides away. On the way he is overtaken by the auto, and has little hopes of beating it, when it stops for gasoline. This gives him a brief advantage, and he arrives in the neighborhood of Boraxville ahead of the car.

In the meantime Murray has arrived at the ranch and, upon inquiring for Willis Johnson, has been directed down the road which he had so recently traversed. He drives back and comes upon Graham escorting the young woman home, having given up hopes of seeing the unknown Willis Johnson ahead of his rival. He is surprised when Murray rushes up to the young woman and makes an offer for the borax property and more surprised when the young woman announces that she is Willis Johnson. When Graham tells her that he is also negotiating for the property, she informs him that she will sell to no other on account of his gallant conduct in rescuing her. She also denounces Murray for his cowardice and greed, and the discomfited rival sulkily enters his car and is driven away, while Graham progresses happily in his role of cavalier and magnate.

PATHE FRERES.

THE COWBOY'S SWEETHEART AND THE BANDIT.—Jack, one of the cowboys on Circle L Ranch, is in love with a neighboring ranch girl, Lucy, and he starts out on his piebald broncho to see her. Leaving the horse on the road he and the girl wander away through the forest. Meantime a no'er-do-well, Dick Dazers, coming along and seeing the horse, mounts and gallops to the crossroads, where he arrives in time to hold up the coach as it comes along the rough road, and separates the passengers from their money and jewels. His horse, however, runs away back to its master, and Jack finds it where he left it. Suspecting nothing he starts on his way back, and arriving at the crossroads sees there a black mask dropped by Dick; he is handling it, wondering how it came there, when the sheriff and his posse, accompanied by an Englishman, who was a passenger on the coach and who had given the alarm, arrive on the scene. Everything points to Jack as the guilty one, and he is bound and led away. On the way they pass Lucy, who does not believe that Jack could be guilty of such a crime. She seizes the Englishman's horse while he is getting a drink and gallops back to the Circle L Ranch and tells Jack's friends. They follow and catch up with the sheriff's party just as he is about to lock Jack in the calaboose. On hearing the evidence things look black against Jack, and they ride homeward to consider what is best to be done. Meantime the Englishman in his wanderings meets Dick, who again tries to hold him up. At this moment Jack's friends come along and capture him and lead him to the sheriff. Lucy tells the sheriff that she believes Dick is the man who really held up the coach, and asks to be allowed to act as his jailor so that she may find out. The sheriff finally consents to her plant, which we will not divulge here. We can assure you it was a very novel idea, and worked out to perfection, with the result that full evidence of Dick's guilt was obtained, and Jack was freed through the efforts of the girl he loved.

MORE OF BETTY'S PRANKS.—It is lunch time and Betty walks in unconcernedly, and upon being reprimanded for her late arrival at the table, "cheeks back." A smart slap on the cheek is her punishment, and she thereupon makes a dash through the garden gate to escape from a home where she feels she is not appreciated. After her runs the whole household, but Betty is fleet-footed, and is not to be caught. Moreover, she knocks over a few customers sitting outside a cafe to retard her relatives, and before they are again in pursuit she has borrowed a milk cart harnessed to a big dog. Driving away furiously she is soon far out of sight and able to run the cart into a farmyard; here she unharnesses the dog and enters the farmhouse to buy a bowl of milk to refresh herself after her long and dusty ride. She and the dog are soon very chummy, and drink out of the same bowl in the friendliest possible manner.

Their meal, however, is interrupted by the appearance of Betty's friends at the door. Through the window the former dashes without a moment's hesitation, and followed by the dog, she makes a bee line for home, overturning a farm laborer and causing another man to fall into a tar barrel on the way; incidents which she regards as infinitely amusing.

PETE HAS A GOOD TIME.—Pete is caught with the goods, which in this instance is a rabbit, which the enterprising fellow has poached from some private preserve, and our first view of him is in the police station, from which he makes an ingenious getaway. Very much on the hike he beats it for the tall timbers with a posse in full cry a short distance in the rear. Seeing a motor car left unattended he cranks it up and putting on the fifth speed tears off a mile or two to a secluded street corner, where he makes a rapid change from his old togs to the glad clothes he finds in a valise in the car. Abandoning his stolen auto at a roadside inn he looks upon the wine when it is red in the company of a veiled lady with whom he has struck up an acquaintance. When the damsel in question finally raises her veil, however, Pete thinks it would have been a merciful act to himself to have allowed the police to catch him. The sight of the officers of the law, close on his trail, however, changes his mind and hastily donning his fair companion's cloak and hat he does another Marathon, ending in the chimney of a house which he enters through an open window. The police, who suspect his design, beat him to the roof by the outside route and nab poor Pete when he emerges, blackened and much the worse for his trip.

THE COWBOY'S STRATAGEM.—Bob loves Mab and his love is returned, but as usual, the course of true love fails to run smooth. Bob and two of his cowboy friends go on a fishing and hunting trip in the Platte River bottoms. On their way they stop at the Post Office. An Eastern lady on horseback riding stops to ask Bob for directions. Mab sees Bob apparently paying marked attentions to the lady. Her jealousy is aroused. Bob follows her home, explains, and the cloud blows over. Bob pops the question. Mab accepts and the ring is given.

The Eastern lady's horse runs away with her. Bob makes a heroic rescue and Mab for the second time in one day finding cause for jealousy, returns Bob's ring and goes away in anger. Bob's companions come upon a bear, and as Steve's gun fails to work, the boys return to camp and find Bob in a good humor to vent his anger on a bear or anything else that will prove an outlet for his feelings.

After finding and shooting the bear, Bob hits on a happy scheme to square matters with Mab, and it is this plan that gives our picture story its name, "A Cowboy's Stratagem." It's a "corker" and for genuine merit and scenic environment will be found a true Selig, consequently in a class by itself.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

HER UNCLE'S WILL.—Ruth, a young society girl, is left a large legacy by her uncle with the understanding that she exclude herself one month each year during the height of the fashionable season, passing this period of exclusion on a dairy farm in the country, occupying her time in the ordinary pursuits of a dairy maid. While she is thus engaged, George Temple, a young son of a wealthy old fellow, is spending a vacation in the same country place.

Ruth and he meet and fall in love. The young beaux takes her home, carrying her pails for her and frequently he is seen calling on her at the farm house entirely unaware of her real station in life. He declares his love and proposes. Ruth consents to become his wife. An old busybody of the village happens to see the young chap in company with Ruth and loses no time in imparting the news to his father, who is disgusted and utterly opposed to his son marrying a dairy maid as quite unbecoming and disgraceful.

The father at once proceeds to the house of the young lady and tells her housekeeper, whom he thinks Ruth's mother, that he strenuously objects to his son marrying her daughter. The joke is on the "old gent." He learns later from the young girl's lawyer of the vast estates and interests of which she is the owner in her own right and that she is merely living on her own farm for health and pleasure. With chagrin and many apologies, he asks Ruth's pardon and, as gracefully as possible under the circumstances, he acknowledges his mistake. George and Ruth are left to themselves and their own happiness.

A BROKEN SYMPHONY.—An old forester lives with his daughter Meg in the midst of a lumbering district. A stalwart young lumberman in charge of a crew of "lumber Jacks" meets Meg and falls deeply in love with her and she with him. Noah, a young hunchback and a wandering camp-fiddler, also falls in love with the girl. Tom, the young lumberman, takes pity on the poor hunchback, gives him food and has him come to the lumber camp and play his fiddle for the boys, who immediately get busy dancing "Money Musk," "Turkey in the Straw," and "Hoe Down"; and they sure enough whoop things up at a lively rate.

Many a lively tune is played to a sad heart. The fiddler's thoughts are not on the dancers; his heart is with Meg. Sadly he feels that his chances of winning her love is handicapped by his poor crippled and deformed body when he looks upon the manly form and splendid physique of Tom, but hoping against hope he does not entirely despair until he sees Tom and Meg in fond and loving embrace; then and not until then he realizes his case is hopeless.

Tom and Meg are engaged and the wedding arranged. Noah is engaged to play his fiddle at the festivities. The wedding day has come, the guests are assembled and Noah takes his place. The ceremony is performed and the dance begins. Noah fiddles with vim and vigor to appease his aching heart. As he thinks of his cherished and unrequited love, the strain is too much for him; he rushes from the place, smashes his violin across his knee and departs into the forest.

The bride and groom go to their new home, the guests depart and Meg's poor old dad returns to his lonely cabin which, without his little Meg, seems cheerless and deserted. Sadly the poor old man goes about his duties, thinking only of his little girl. While thus engaged the hunchback appears on the scene, sad and depressed. Meg's father lays his hands on his shoulder, trying to cheer him, telling Noah of his own loneliness and offering the poor fellow a home with him, they will at least be company for each other.

Noah declines his kind offer, but is finally won over, when the old man goes into the house and brings out an old fiddle, a companion of former days, telling the young fellow that his ear for tune has grown dim and his skill departed and he will give the instrument to him. Noah takes it and plays while the old forester sits by attentively listening and carried into sweet dreams and happy thoughts on the sweet strains of the playing of the hunchback's soulful music.

TWA HIELAND LADS.—Two Highland laddies, one seven feet four; the other five feet fit, tired of farm work and every other kind of work for that matter are sent to the mill with bags of grain on their shoulders. After trudging through fields they set their sacks on the ground and seat themselves on them and begin to discuss the white man's burdens and the general cussidness of labor.

In the midst of their dialogue a "Tommy Atkinson" of the English army comes along, tells them that they are foolish to work so hard and advises them to join the ranks. Slinging their bags away, they beat a double quick to the recruiting station, at which they arrive and after an examination are accepted and placed in the awkward squad of the "Kilties."

The Sergeant who takes them in hand becomes almost insane in his efforts to teach them military tactics. The boys of the regiment play all sorts of practical jokes on them, and one day while "Meg and Janky" and "short and squatty" are looking in the swimming tank, the boys push them in, clothes and all. The two bumpkins await a chance to get square with their comrades. Two officers of the regiment sauntering along stop and gaze into the tank and the two guys shove their superiors into the water.

ATLAS.

THE REST CURE. Peace-loving John Quiet had lived long and satisfactorily to himself. Instigated by a doctor's prescription, an indulgent sister's solicitude and a brother-in-law's desire for companionship, he is induced to rusticate in the mountains in the belief that he needs must take the rest cure. To a jovial, fun-loving nature as typified by his brother-in-law, unusual inconveniences are trivial items, but to old John they mean discomfort.

Riding seven miles over rough country roads in a nearly springless wagon, and perched among movable trunks and sundry baggage, might be passed over as an incident, but to be deposited without ceremony or the knowledge of the other occupants of the vehicle in the middle of the road and act as a buffer for the contents of the wagon would prejudice almost anyone against the simple life. How one can rest amidst a horde of mischievous youngsters who consider that your sole reason for being in the vicinity is to act as a subject for their pranks, John does not appreciate. To have an afternoon nap disturbed by suddenly being drenched by a pail of ice-cold spring water and then buried 'neath tons of hay, to have an interesting day's fishing spoiled by an involuntary bath, might afford occasion for anger in almost anyone.

But the worm will turn, and so did John when his old bachelor and woman hater was pestered by an old female, who will not give up hopes of capturing a man till Gabriel toots his horn, and so, when his one enjoyment—a bath in the old swimming hole—was interfered with by this female, his clothes removed and the entire population aroused and brought upon the scene to recover his drowned body, John then and there rebelled and vowed that the rest cure would entice him never again.

ECLAIR.

THE SOLDIER'S HONOR.—Lucy tells John, her lover, and a young officer in the army, that she has decided to release him, and upon his pleading with her, confesses that she cares for another. In a fit of madness, brought on by jealousy and disappointment, he seizes Lucy by the throat and strangles her. Suddenly realizing what he has done, he leaves the house, and rushing into his mother's boudoir, beseeches her to save him, as he has become a criminal.

Later on, the public prosecutor calls upon General Lepran, who is ignorant of his son's trouble, and informs the General that it has become his duty to arrest his son. The father is enraged at what he hears, and immediately seeks his son in his room and denounces him for the disgrace he has brought upon his name. He then places a revolver in his son's hand, and leaves the room, commanding him to atone for his sin and save the honor of his name. The father then returns to the mother, and both wait in horrible anguish the sound of the shot that will bereave them of their boy, but save the soldier's honor.

A few seconds later, and then a messenger rushes in with a telegram which states that Lucy has passed out of danger, and will not prosecute her lover, John. They hurry to the young officer's room, but arrive too late, the deed has been done and—the soldier's honor saved!

SHE SURVEYS HER SON-IN-LAW.—Our hero is the harassed victim of an over-vigilant mother-in-law; never, never, notwithstanding all his efforts, it seems, can he enjoy, unmolested, the dictates of his own sweet will, but he must yield himself in to be guided and governed, body and soul, by the ever-watchful and exacting mother-in-law. One day he takes up his flute, thinking to lose himself in the cares of his existence by pouring forth the distress of his heart in doleful minor notes. This does not please mother-in-law, and she worries our poor friend until he flees to his room in despair. There he continues to toot-toot, while her ladyship pounds upon the door, commanding him to cease, and threatening all manner of things. The poor man glances out of the window, and seeing a tramp perching himself on a railing just outside the window, a bright idea seizes him, and motioning the tramp to come in, gives him a coin and instructs him to continue the tooting, while he escapes unsuspected for a few hours' relaxation. He makes his exit through the window, and jumps into a cab, but mother has been too much for him, and he little dreams that the coachwoman is dear mother-in-law! He calls to see a lady friend, who is particularly glad to see him—and vice-versa. Mother-in-law disguises herself as the colored maid, and waits idle. Later on the unfortunate fellow recognizes the waiting maid, and, true to the old adage, "at last the worm turned." He pursues her to the kitchen and finding her in hiding, picks up the stove can and slips it over mother-in-law's head, pressing it down hard. Mother-in-law is stout, and therefore she suffers. Many were the expedients tried and long was the time before mother-in-law could regain her usual amount of fresh air, light and comfort, and when at last this is accomplished he is cured of her discomforting vigilance, and her son-in-law is restored to domestic peace and tranquillity.

"IMP."

YANKEEANNA. There are national troubles which arise between the countries of Yankeeanna and Revolutio. The President of Revolutio sends his Charge d'Affairs to the Secretary of Yankeeanna to endeavor to straighten out the differences. On the arrival of the Charge d'Affairs in Yankeeanna he discovers an injured newsboy on the street. An auto passing along, in which is the Secretary's daughter, stops and takes the boy to the hospital. Later, during the conversation between the Charge d'Affairs and the Secretary of State of Yankeeanna which is not panning out very favorably, the Secretary's daughter enters the room and is immediately recognized by the Charge d'Affairs as the girl who took the injured boy to the hospital. It is a case of love at first sight. The Charge d'Affairs is now called home by the President with the intention of declaring war against Yankeeanna, but the documents are kept away from him by the daughter. The Charge d'Affairs and the girl declare their love for one another, as also two more Yankeeanna girls for two men from Revolutio, and while Revolutio is busy preparing for the war, the three couples are busy getting married. Yankeeanna accepts the challenge of war and immediately decides to move upon their country, but in a different way than is expected by Revolutio, as they enter with a flag of truce and ask for the forgiveness and blessing of the President of Revolution upon the international marriages, which is cheerfully given, and all differences are settled.

IRONY OF FATE. An author whose sole thought is his books, and who is a veritable bookworm, has a beautiful young wife, and as he leaves her alone continually she is forced to seek her own amusement. A friend of his comes to pay them a visit and the husband turns him over to his wife, saying they must entertain one another, as he is too busy with his books. The friend is rather reluctant to accept this arrangement, but under the circumstances is obliged to do so, as the husband insists on it. After an elapse of a couple of weeks, the wife and friend realize that they are falling in love with each other. The friend, not wishing to be a party to any wrongdoing, decides to leave, but is prevented by the husband, who has been suddenly called to the city, and he wishes his friend to stay and protect his wife while he is away. While the husband is in the city he has an attack of sunstroke and is carried home in a very serious condition, and after the doctor's visit is told to keep very quiet, as any undue excitement would be liable to cause his death. The friend and wife meet in the library; he confesses his love for her and tells her he must leave her home. The husband gets up to work on his books and in walking through the library discovers his wife and friend in serious conversation, and thinking that his wife is untrue to him he gets into such a rage he falls in a faint. The doctor is immediately sent for, who injects morphine to install his heart to a normal condition. The doctor leaves his morphine and syringe by mistake and it is picked up by the wife, who shows it to the friend, who suspects her of having given it to her husband. The wife, upon re-entering the husband's bedroom, has a fierce argument with him, which causes his death (by excitement). The friend steps in, picks up the morphine bottle and hides it to protect the wife from being accused of murder; but upon the doctor's visit she is exonerated, as he gave the morphine to the husband and the sunstroke was the real cause of his death. The friend, feeling as though he was a partial cause of the death, decides to go West and be heard of no more, and writes telling the wife so.

YANKEE

THE BROKER'S DAUGHTER.—With an independent income, a beautiful home and a talented daughter, Joseph Jacobs could not leave well enough alone.

As a clothing manufacturer he had shown ability, was successful and prospered. But, filled with ambition, he longed for new worlds to conquer, and, like many another unshorn lamb, chose Wall street as his field of action.

Jacobs' experience is but a repetition of so many similar tales chronicled in the daily paper. The cobbler should stick to his last—the same old story—ruin and bankruptcy. But how of them at home? The tales of business failure do not divulge the sufferings and heartaches of the wives and children. In this case Jacobs' daughter Ethel received the full brunt of the storm.

Ethel a few short months previously had met Ralph Rose—the acquaintance was formed at the time he soundly thrashed several roughs who had offered insult to Ethel—and it was a case of love at first sight.

The father received Ralph with much favor and it was during the festivities of the engagement party given in honor of Ethel and Ralph that the crisis occurred.

Called from among his guests Jacobs is handed a telegram requesting his immediate presence at the office where he finds things tottering. The bottom has dropped out of the market. Every available possession possessed by him is thrown into the breach. Not a dozen fortunes equal to Jacobs' can stem the tide.

Wiped out and ruined, he returns to his home where he informs the assembled guests of his bankruptcy. Like rats leaving a sinking vessel the guests lose no time in making their departure, all but Ralph who offers his services to Jacobs and his daughter in their hour of need. Ethel's made of stern stuff, passes the fortune and we can tell, perhaps saves him from a suicide's grave.

You might as well be dead as broke. [illegible] successful business man after years of struggle and the accumulation of a large fortune, and then to lose it all, and be obliged to begin at a comparatively early age to [illegible]

But every cloud has a silver lining, [illegible] day Jacobs finds himself in possession of a [illegible] pertinent clue to his long-[illegible] [illegible] of money and other valuables. Ethel, [illegible] urges him home, where the struggle [illegible] this to come and to return to [illegible] [illegible] gives her the [illegible] is nothing to [illegible] the owner, so [illegible] advertises for [illegible] is found.

THE U. S. REVENUE DETECTIVE. Wm. McPherson bids his wife and baby good-bye for a journey into the wilds of Kentucky. He has been summoned by the Revenue Department for this important mission.

The moonshiners have grown unusually energetic and Uncle Sam determined that every still should be smashed, and when Uncle Samuel says a thing he generally means it.

Mac's wife and baby were very dear to him and these continual separations caused a tugging at his heartstrings, greater than the serious events of his adventurous calling. But a man in his position is not supposed to question. The word "duty" is paramount on every occasion.

Arriving at a small town in Kentucky armed with a letter from his chief, he was successful in obtaining the services of a number of picked men who knew every inch of the ground and were practically without fear. As a construction crew on a new branch of railroad their identity was very successfully concealed.

After a season of careful strategy and numerous hard battles the gang was put to rout, handcuffed and "moonshine" became a dead letter in that section. One of the most difficult problems of his career now confronted Mac.

A young moonshiner with a pretty wife and daughter presented the problem. During one of his scouting expeditions Mac and Simpson, his right-hand man, were captured by two guards, dragged into the moonshine camp and stared death in the face for a few moments as they looked down the muzzles of their guns. Mac was a jovial chap and probably his coolness and bravery at this crucial moment caused the young wife to intervene in his behalf; and the sight of the other deputies coming to the rescue led to their attempt to escape at that moment. The battle was short and decisive; the vagabonds were outnumbered and outclassed, Mac being well satisfied with the result.

One incident remained—the detective came upon the young moonshiner hiding in the well, his wife and baby by his side. There was no question, the man merited arrest and a long term of imprisonment, but the wife pleaded: "I saved your life, now spare us." Thoughts of home and his own baby—well, Mac shut his official eyes for a moment. The department never heard of it, but Mac felt he did his duty nevertheless.

LOVE IN MEXICO.—When Luzetta goes to fill her jug with water she meets Petro, her peasant lover. He accompanies her to her home and while they are having a love scene she is rudely ordered into the cottage by her disagreeable, mercenary father and poor Petro sent off because of his poverty. Jacques, a wealthy suitor, shortly after comes and offers gold for Luzetta. This is perfectly satisfactory to her father, but not so to the girl. She holds them off with her stiletto and mounts a ladder to the upper part of the cottage. The father takes away the ladder and says there she will remain until she accepts Jacques. Luzetta, however, risks making her way out through the window, and does get away. An old Mexican woman sees her flight and goes into the cottage to tell of it. Jacques and the father hurry after Luzetta. She leads them up and down hills and through many dangerous places and at last, breathless, she reaches her sweetheart's hut. He is seated disconsolately on the porch, gazing lovingly at the rose she had given him. They both enter the house and bolt the door. Jacques and the father beat on this until it gives way, but by this time Petro and Luzetta have gotten out of the window and are mounted on a horse. They ride to the [illegible] to be married, while the other two return to the cottage arguing [illegible] the gold. "Imps Draw the Crowds"

WE now announce two totally unique films which, we believe, will open new fields in the way of moving picture plots and create no end of favorable comment among the patrons of your theatre. The first is a high-class drama, the second a splendid farce comedy with a plot as bizarre as a comic opera. Every friend we have is urged to make immediate arrangements with his exchange to get both these releases.

"The Irony of Fate"

Released Monday, August 1. A story much more complex than the average attempt of moving picture producers; one that would be ruined unless handled as skilfully as our famous stock company has done. Read the synopsis elsewhere in this issue and tell your exchange you want "THE IRONY OF FATE."

"Yankeeanna"

Released Thursday, August 4. This deals with love and war between the mythical countries of Yankeeanna and Revolutio. It shows how Master Cupid hands the War God a knockout punch. Its fun is delicious, clean and natural. You could run this a week and never grow tired of it. Ask now for "YANKEEANNA."

to the Merits of

THE MIRROR SCREEN

Call at the VARIETIES THEATRE

112 Third Avenue, New York City and see the difference between the old and the new. As day is to night, so is the brightness of the picture on a Mirror Screen compared with the ordinary curtain. You can turn on the house lights without eclipsing the picture if it is on a Mirror Screen.

Tuck and Manning, 406 Gaiety Theatre Building, wants every New York exhibitor to inspect the screen at the Varieties Theatre.

Human Life Photography

Patent Mirror Screen came in good shape. I would not take $1,000.00 for it if I could not buy another. I have opposition, but the Mirror Screen makes his picture look like 30 cents.

Very truly,
S. G. SMITH, New Lexington, Ohio.

How is it all done? The MIRROR SCREEN IS THE ANSWER. It ReflectS, MagnifieS, TransmitS and IntensifieS ExpressioN, BringS PictureS to LifE.

Many cities have taken up this question—"How Can the Picture Theatres Be Better Lighted"? For moral reasons we demand light during performances. The MIRROR SCREEN is the solution of this well taken reform.

THANHOUSER FILMS

IMPORTANT TO EXHIBITORS

There is a silly story going the rounds to the effect that we are making only ONE release a week. The rumor is thoroughly false, as everyone who has been watching our work knows. We release a "Thanhouser" every TUESDAY and FRIDAY. The 2 "Thanhousers" that are released every week are essential to the well-being of your business. You know this to be so. Make your exchange give you both of 'em. Certainly trade doesn't come so easily in Summer that you can afford to miss a single "Thanhouser" THAT REALLY IS RELEASED AND REALLY IS OBTAINABLE. The next time you're told that we make but ONE release a week, tell the teller to GUESS AGAIN. We're right on the job with TWO, and if you don't get them it's your own fault.

Say Say "THANHOUSER" To the Exchange Man! Say "THANHOUSER" To the Exchange Man!

"THANHOUSER"

To the Exchange Man and You'll get

A Thanhouser Comic that'll make ANY day "Fun Day" at your Theatre was a Day of Woe Instead of a Day of Joy He Meant it to be. It taught him to never, never leave wifie's side—not even for a day! The day you show the "Day Off" will be a big day at your place—provided you announce it a bit a day or so before.

JENK'S DAY OFF

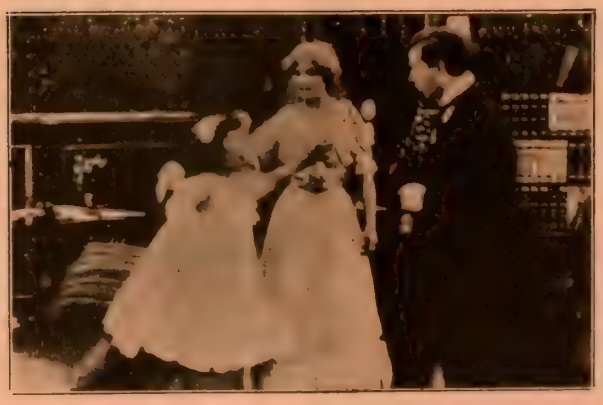
Approximate Length, 1000 Feet No. 130 Code Word, Day

RELEASED TUESDAY, AUGUST 2d

SCENE FROM "JENK'S DAY OFF"



SCENE FROM "THE RESTORATION"

THE RESTORATION

How Sight of a Tiny Daughter Restored a Long-Lost Memory

This isn't a "Thanhouser Classic" in the accepted or advertised sense of the term, but it is a "Thanhouser Classic" for all that, if a subject that will go down through time as an unusual release can be considered a classic. Anyway, it's an almighty gripping idea done into an almighty pretty picture and your patrons will like it as much as anything we've turned out to date.

Approximate Length, 1000 Feet No. 132 Code Word, Restoration

When they have bought all the exchanges they want, they will begin to buy theatres.

Also—With Your Money!!!

Don't think for a moment that you, Mr. Small Exhibitor, are going to get a fine offer for your theatre because the Trust wants it. They don't. They figure that by getting control of the big houses in your locality they can just crush you out of existence. And they would do it by using if you keep on taking their service.

A little more than a year ago you couldn't help yourself, BUT NOW you can put your fingers to your nose and exercise your just prerogative. THE INDEPENDENT SIDE TO-DAY SPELLS REAL INDEPENDENCE FOR YOU, with a program of the highest quality and with preparations going on for the production of pictures that will rival any brands now on the market. But a stronger argument for you is the prevalence of a spirit of "pull-together" and co-operation—every man standing ready to help the other.

Not Monoply—Prosperity!

Are you going to give up your two dollars

St. Louis Exhibitors!

Patronize the W. H. Swanson St. Louis Film Co.

Get a Square Deal and No Misrepresentations

Last week the two Licensed exchanges formerly in St. Louis were cancelled by the M. P. P. Company. They were replaced by a branch office of the Yale Concern of Kansas City that starts in with glowing promises. Let us show them up to you and then see how far they can be depended upon to "deliver the goods." Their ad states:

> We will start in with 1000 reels of New Licensed Film. We will be able to furnish to our customers at reasonable rental, all the big feature film subjects put on the market during the past few years by the licensed manufacturers. We will buy from two to five prints of each and every film subject put on the market by the licensed manufacturers from this time on.

Let's do a little figuring. All the licensed manufucturers are turning out for the whole United States market about 1,600 reels a week, running absolutely to their capacity. This branch concern is going to start right off with 1,000 new reels. In other words they have bought nearly two-thirds of an entire week's output of the Trust manufacturers who could not possibly make that many extra reels by working night and day; and besides if they bought the entire week's product they would be stocking up with from 30 to 200 of each subject. Are you crazy enough to believe that?

They also promise to furnish you with every old feature subject made by licensed manufacturers in the past few years. How's that going to be possible with all those new reels? Close inspection of their stock will probably convince exhibitors that it will be easier to get the old features than the 1,000 new reels.

A thousand new reels cost $100,000. Any man that would invest that amount in a new exchange at one investment needs his sanity looked into. They are going to buy from two to five prints of each subject. Well, let's see how that figures out. The licensed manufacturers turn out 23 varieties a week. From two to five prints means an average of 2 1-2 reels, or 57 1-2 reels a week. At $100.00 a reel this means $5,750.00 a week for new film; more money than any three St. Louis exchanges are now receiving for film rentals; and, besides, it costs something to run an exchange. Perhaps this wonderful concern from K. C. is going to show us how to do business for the fun of the thing and not lose money! It is to laugh—the brazen con game that they have sprung on exhibitors in the St. Louis territory. Get wise to all their bunk, then LOOK UP SWANSON who is on the square and will give you an independent service that will be just as represented. At present

Across the Footlights.

One day this week we visited two theaters on Moving Picture Row in the company of a talented actor and a well-known playright, ostensibly to compare the pictorial presentation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" by two separate companies. One of these had condensed the principal outstanding features of Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous work into a single reel or a show of barely twenty minutes. The other gave us the first of a series of three, to be issued in succession, which naturally allowed more scope for detail and effect. Therefore it is not within our province to draw a comparison of their respective merits, but we will quote a remark made by our actor friend. Said he: "One is like the first act of a classic drama; the other is like a one-act playlet." He found no fault with the stage management or even the acting of the latter; in fact, he expressed himself as believing that in the one-reel presentation the characters of the story were even more closely drawn to what his conception of them would be. But he asserted, and we fully agree with him, that the dignity and scope of the work was beyond the possibility of adequate presentation in a single reel.

Also on the program of the theater showing the first of the three-reel series was the picture dramatization of another popular novel. Neither of these productions elicited any applause, in fact it was remarked that they were received with almost listless inattention. Yet both were better staged, better acted and better photographed than the ordinary run of picture plays. Why, then, this apathy? Was it that the program was too heavy? No, our playright friend argued that their weakness lay in the dramatization. The adapter of the play, or scenario writer, had played into the hands of the scenic artist rather than to the audience—to the eye, but not to the mind.

Our friend was asked for and gave the following as a formula for the preparation of a successful drama: A tense situation or impressive scene at the outset to at once rivet the attention, followed by sharply contrasted situations or expressions (if the term may be used in speaking of the silent drama), all leading up to a dramatic moment or climax.

Film manufacturers, he said, erred in judgment, because, while lavish in their expenditures, yet they economized at the wrong end. They employ high-salaried actors, go to no end of expense for props or even suitable natural settings; but the writer of the scenario may be anybody or a nobody. Few manufacturers had yet held out sufficient inducement to attract the best available talent to this field.

True, we remarked, but the average writer, and even the most talented, has so little conception of what can successfully be translated by the silent picture, that even the best stories have to be so altered by the producer that they are barely recognizable by the author.

Yes, and that is why so many of the most pretentious picture plays fall flat. There is a sameness in all their treatment. It is not enough for skillful camera men and stage directors to rack their brains for effects. The element of originality must be in the plot. There must be a motive for every scene and they must be logical. The silent drama must be made to stir the emotions as well as please the eye. In other words, the picture must be made to express thought as well as depict action. How few of them do!

In the pictoria! dramatization of a novel, for example, it is not sufficient for one man to select the situations that will make the best series of pictures, and let it go at that. The first essential is to discern the underlying motive, sentiment or moral and keep that always in view. The finished picture is seen by myriads of eyes and must have something in it to appeal to thousands of different intellects. The writer, if such exists, who has so wide and deep a conception of human nature, is not yet available to the film manufacturer. Therefore, the next best thing they can do to employing rare talent, is to pass no working scenario into the hands of the producer until it has been re-read and revised and amended by a number of competent persons. Such a course would eliminate much of the trash we have to submit to seeing on the screen. In fact, the one thing that is needed to sustain and even to increase the public interest in the picture is MORE BRAINS at the fountain head.

Requiescat in Pace.

Without the shedding of a tear, a faithful few attended the obsequies of that one-time active body, the Film Service Association, at Detroit, on July 21-23. F. S. A. did not die of old age, but, like many a man who has outlived his usefulness, to be succeeded by more virile strength, it just petered out. Sentimentalists may say that F. S. A. died of a broken heart. At all events it cannot be said that the mourners carried their sorrow heavily—and there was a glorious wake.

But, to be serious, we are sorry to record the passing of the F. S. A., for that is what means the adjournment of its last meeting sine die. Who will dare say that its checkered career was not without its usefulness? If nothing else, it at least established a bond of fellowship and entente cordiale between a number of diversified interests and competing factors that has had a very salutary effect upon the business. In fact, for this reason alone we are sorry that it was not continued as a social organization.

At the one short business session, President Gilligham called to order the representatives of some twenty or more licensed film exchanges; Secretary Freuler read the minutes of the previous meeting and Treasurer Lieber rendered his report, which showed that the organization was in a healthy financial condition.. No business being brought before the meeting the motion to adjourn sine die was in order, and after all outstanding bills had been paid it was voted to donate the balance in the treasury to the Red Cross Association of America.

Then the delegates cut loose. Detroit is a banner convention city, moreover it is President Gilligham's home town and he had planned to give his guests a rousing time. About half of them had their wives along and the good social time they had will long be remembered. Launches carried the party to Star Island, in Lake St. Clair, where a dinner was served. Automobile parties to Belle Isle and along the delightful boulevards of Detroit, moonlight trips on the river and other pleasant festivities ably prearranged by the entertainment committee, of which President Gilligham was chairman, was a delightful and fitting termination to the dear old F. S. A. Peace to its ashes!

Higher Ideals.

In this great age of progress while some public-spirited individuals work hard and spare neither time nor money to enlighten the world and place before the people the best and most powerful educator, in the shape of motion pictures, others of the selfish class take hold of this great cinematographic industry to make it a gambling speculation.

Motion pictures are not only a source of amusement but a great educator, a great reformer. The capital invested in motion pictures is represented by millions, and thousands of persons depend on cinematography as a support. If motion pictures were to drop out of sight, we would suffer a genuine panic and thousands of persons would be thrown out of work.

The honest manufacturers, those who have started the industry, those who by their hard work and capital have made it possible to combine education with pleasure, fully realize the situation and are doing their very best to elevate motion pictures and make of them the universal educator of the world. They still add new buildings to their already large and costly plants, they build new plants and money seems to be no object to them, to reach the goal of their ambition. For those who are watching closely it is a pleasure to see how many men are devoting their time, energy, brains and money to bring cinematography into the schools and churches, and these men, although already rewarded in a financial way, deserve a good deal more praise, and let us hope that future generations will recognize their great work.

To offset this bright side of the question, we are deeply pained to see that a few selfish men, who have only one ambition, the one of grabbing every dollar in sight, without any thought of the future, are using their efforts to pull down the industry, to the detriment of other manufacturers and of the public in general.

In this class we count the ignorant exhibitor, who, to cash all the nickels in sight, does not care for quality, but shows his pictures in the most slovenly manner, to the disgust of the public. With his sordid mind he believes that the public is no better and wants only sensational and suggestive pictures, and if he cannot find enough sensational films, he finds at least enough dirty, suggestive posters to make of his theater an ugly billboard, and with all these offensive posters, he adds the cheapest and most vulgar vaudeville acts that he can find. These are the shows ruining the industry and we cannot blame decent persons and newspapers who all the time hurl a stone at motion pictures.

We have in America the same parallel as in Europe. All that is a go in Paris is a success in Europe, and all that is a failure in Paris finds no admirers in other cities. In the United States the eyes are riveted on New York, the worst place on earth for motion pictures; and taking New York as the keynote, the authorities, ministers, newspapers, etc., of other cities jump on motion pictures. This is wrong, because if New York exhibitors do not know how to show moving pictures, smaller towns know and are not only making money but are giving a clean, decent amusement to the people.

The exhibitor is not the only guilty one. Many renters can be shown up, men who speculate on old junk, who tire and discourage a willing public with films that should be discarded forever. Here again the greed; the renter, like the exhibitor, looks at to-day and does not think of the morrow. To get one dollar more out of a lot of old junk, he gambles to lose the whole future, as the public will not stand for this old junk and will stop visiting the theaters if better films are not shown. Better films? We have plenty of them, but the renter does not want to buy them; he prefers to make the old ones last as long as possible. If the renter wanted to be a little more liberal, he would encourage the manufacturer, who in turn could greatly improve his productions when assured of a certain output, and the exhibitor with a better service could get better attendance and everyone would be making money.

To these selfish men let us add the business upheavals that have been the luck of the independent manufacturers. They now claim to be a unit. Let us hope that this unity will bring a solution and a long and glorious future assured to motion pictures. Let us hope that in this unity the independents will adopt the policy of the licensed folks and work in harmony with the same object in view, work with a clear head and no worry of mind for the betterment of cinematography in general. We must give credit to the legitimate manufacturers that they are not working for the dollar of to-day but for the future, and if it was not so, they would not spend the money they are now lavishing on new studios, new factories, new offices, etc. The Sales Company, following the example of the Patents Company, work as a unit and although we hear some complaints from a few dissatisfied ones (we always have some kickers) we must admit that the new rules are for the betterment of the industry in general.

J. M. B.

Motion Picture Backgrounds.

By H. F. Hoffman.

An article by "Spectator" appeared in the Dramatic Mirror of July 16 in which he feels called upon to defend himself against certain objections that had been raised by some of his previous remarks about "Jersey Scenery." The "Spectator's" previous remarks were inspired by his being obliged to witness many so-called "Western pictures," in most of which he was able to recognize the old familiar Palisades in the background.

He perceived in this constant repetition a monotonous lack of versatility, and made bold to say so on several occasions. In fact, it bored him so that he began to use the term "Jersey Scenery" in a sarcastic sense, and, later on, as a matter of evolution, he fell into the very unjust habit of applying the term "Jersey Scenery" to everything in the way of bad backgrounds, regardless of whether the subject was photographed in Staten Island, Long Island, New York or Connecticut. He made the term general, and with him "Jersey Scenery" became a synonym for mediocrity, in much the same sense that we speak of Connecticut tobacco, or Michigan watermelons, or American Swiss cheese.

When the vials of wrath were opened and poured upon his head, the "Spectator" came to the front with as much grace as possible and made public confession of his sinful habit. Moreover, he did a penance by stating that New Jersey abounds with some of the finest natural scenery on God's footstool, and by so doing he and I are still friends, for I live in Jersey and had he not made this retraction I would never speak to him again. He said at last what he should have said at first: that the scenery is there all right, if the film makers would only go after it, but they found it so convenient to skip just across the river from New York to the dear old Palisades for anything and everything that required an outdoor background, that the interior stood neglected and unexplored; which is true to a great extent.

The scenery is there, surely enough, and it is only begging for some man to come along and find it. The same is true of the localities north, south and east of Manhattan. But the man never comes. The idea of keeping a man out scouting for pretty scenes strikes the average manufacturer as scandalous waste of money. He is willing to pay a scenic artist and stage carpenter their union scale from sheer force of circumstances, but with regards to natural scenery, the usual way is to pack the whole troupe into a motor bus and send them off to select their own backgrounds, and the result is usually much wasted time and indifferent or accidental success.

I have maintained for a long time that every manufacturer should employ a man whose only business would be to scour the countryside and pick out the beauty spots, but it "listens bad" to the film maker. The idea of some other man having a continuous joy ride in his automobile at his expense is a hard lump for the manufacturer to swallow. I will admit that it looks like a pretty soft job for the beauty spotter, and one that would appeal to many thousands, but after all, sometimes the jobs that look like the softest snaps are really the most wearisome tasks in the world.

To give an illustration, I recall the time when I was an exhibitor and moving pictures were at the very zenith of their popularity. The children, especially the boys, were wild about them and were worrying all day long about raising money enough to take in the show at night. At that time I though it necessary to keep tab of my competitor's pictures and to that end I made arrangements with a young lad to go at my expense each night to the other house, sit all through the show and return with his report. Needless to say, he became a demi-god among the other boys. They envied him and secretly wished him an early demise in the hope that I would then require another boy. This kept up for about six weeks when I received a note from my boy saying he had had enough. Too much of a good thing, even for a boy.

Your joy rider would have plenty to do, because if he were a systematic man he would consider it necessary to take photographs of each scene selected. These he would file away for future use, with full directions how and when to get there, together with name or permission of the property owner, etc. The candidates for the position would be many, but when it same to sifting them down according to their qualifications and merits, there would be few of them left to choose from. The right man should be an artist, preferably a landscape artist. One who has served his time before an easel and learned by dint of personal application just what objects and conditions in nature make for art and those that do not. He should be grounded in the laws of composition, such as balance, light and shade, rhythm, contrast, repetition, leading line, massing, subordination, simplicity, form, detail, tone quality, etc.

It will require something more than a mere mechanical photographer. There seems to be a general notion that because a camera man can produce a good negative from a technical point of view that he is an artist. To the contrary, a good mechanic is always a bad artist, and a good artist is usually a vile mechanic. The reason is that one works with facts and measurable quantities while the other works by instinct and unmeasurable quantities. A true mechanic delights in facts, figures and measurements while your true artist revolts at them. Taking the two in combination, they should between them produce an artistic photograph.

Now in regard to this matter of "Jersey Scenery," I have been over a considerable portion of North Jersey during the past few months in my official capacity as private detective of the Hot Muffin and Quick Delivery Company of New Jersey. By this means I had many chances during odd moments to observe and meditate upon the beauties of nature. I was always firm in my belief that there were many beautiful scenes that had been overlooked in those parts, and this I considered as my opportunity to bring some of them to light.

It seems that the Hot Muffin and Quick Delivery Company had been bothered by tramps who were stealing the muffins from doorsteps, and it became my duty as private detective to follow this band of nomadic gentlemen from town to town and whenever I saw them stealing our muffins it was also my duty to chase them, which I did. These chases led me into some of the most beautiful sylvan retreats imaginable, and which I could not attempt to describe herein.

It will be seen that my duties of patroling the streets, and seeing that the muffins were unmolested by the muffin thieves, kept me within the city limits most of the time, and for that reason most of the backgrounds mentioned below are those of an architectural nature. By giving the street and number it is easy for the reader, if interested, to find them. It is much more difficult to give the exact location of an arbitrary landscape, except by photographs, or by chalk marks such as are used by muffin thieves. Furthermore, the rate of speed at which I went by these scenes, in my capacity of private detective to the Hot Muffin and Quick Delivery Company, in pursuit of muffin thieves, rendered it impractical for me to pause to take observations, memoranda or photographs at the time.

Before proceeding with the list of backgrounds mentioned below, I desire to state that they were gathered at random during idle moments, purely accidental, and without going out of my way to find them. I have no doubt that with the use of a motor car and the freedom of my time I could have found many more in out-of-the-way places here and there. I do not claim any greatness for them but merely present them as suitable backgrounds for moving pictures. In them will be found an absence of clapboards and all products of the jig-saw. The reader is welcome to investigate and make use of these observations if he thinks well of them. On the other hand, if they are found by others to be impractical or commonplace, they will have the satisfaction of knowing that there is no charge for it. After which we will proceed with the list.

Hoboken—Willow Terrace, between Sixth and Seventh streets, running through from Willow avenue to Clinton street. Three little parallel streets of quaint squatty houses in the Dutch style. Built in solid rows and resembling a European village street. Nice cobble stone effect; good setting for a Dutch or German comedy or drama. Blocks run east and west.

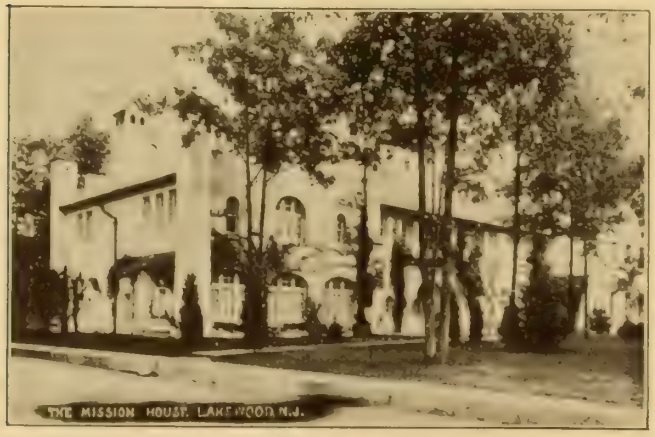
Hoboken—Holy Innocents Church, Sixth street and Willow avenue. Sunday School building in rear near Clinton avenue, facing east; must be taken through fence at close quarters. Good setting for German barracks or tavern.

Hoboken—Rear of (new) Stevens Institute. Stone gateway and tower; suitable for the entrance to the grounds of a medieval castle; facing southwest.

Montclair—Gateway to Montclair Academy, facing east, showing a series of modern stone steps, flanked by shade trees on each side, receding upward and terminating distantly in a massive door. Suitable for a royal wedding procession or approach to a stately court.

Montclair—Mountain Avenue station, Greenwood Lake division of the Erie Railroad (not far from Montclair Academy). Small, neglected old stone house, facing east. Suitable for a scene of peasantry or squalid respectability; also for a hermit's abode, a suspicious rendezvous, or a house of gloom on the Edgar Allan Poe style.

Plainfield—44 Somerset street. Well-kept Colonial mansion setting well back from street, good for war drama in a scene showing the affluence or prosperity of the South before the war. Facing south.



Plainfield—229 East Front street. Old Colonial house, facing southeast. I consider this without doubt the best adapted setting for a war drama that I have seen. The house stands 200 feet back and is approached on each side by a straight stately row of trees. The trees do not obscure the house, which may be plainly seen at the end of this avenue of tall trees, setting in a solemn dignity. It is somewhat dilapidated and the grass is uncut. There is a pretty effect of sun spots coming through the shady trees, flecking the broad approach and the tall columns and Colonial doorway. A regiment of soldiers could be photographed before the house on the lawn, which is very level and somewhat below the street grade.

Lakewood—52 Madison avenue. Vined mansion in the German style, viz., plaster and timbered woodwork with small latticed swinging windows. Excellent for a window romance or street scene in one, if viewed from eastern side.

Lakewood—402 Lake Drive. Mansion of delicate stone tracery with odd and pretty windows and doors. A study in white, facing south.

Lakewood—428 Lake drive. Handsome dwelling in the German style, ultra German in detail. Romantic.

Lakewood—Lynch Castle. Suitable for medieval drama of kings and queens. This castle is too large to be included well in one picture, but some of the detail aspects would lend themselves nicely. There are many pretty views of it across the neighboring lawns, showing the castle towers in the distance just over the tree tops. It is the private residence of Mr. Lynch, a Lakewood citizen.

Lakewood contains far more material for the camera man than any of the places I visited. The lake itself has pretty nooks and corners; the tall graceful pines have an artistic value and the dwellings are nearly all picturesque. Georgian Court, the residence of Mr. George Gould, is a bonanza of landscape gardening and one that would keep a photographer busy for weeks. Louis XVI. himself never lived in greater state than this, the magnificence of which is almost beyond belief.

Summertime is the off season in Lakewood. There are very few people in town and the camera man can work unmolested. Speaking with photographers and business men in the village, I learn that it is quite easy to get consent from the property owners, for as a rule they are very proud of their pretty places and like to have them pictured. Mr. Gould is especially proud of Georgian Court. It had always been open to the public until recently when it was closed owing to vandalism and the American habit of gathering souvenirs. Mrs. Gould has been an actress and for that reason they can have no especial antipathy toward theatrical people. In fact they have a theater of their own there and occasionally they pull off an outdoor drama that is a truly brilliant spectacle.

CAPTAIN ROGER BACON STARTS FOR THE WAR.

Scene from "A Colonial Belle," a Revolutionary War story by the Kalem Company. We reproduce it in connection with the article, "Moving Picture Backgrounds," because it shows a successful attempt to provide a consistent background as well as correct costumes. The Colonial mansion seen in the picture was discovered in an obscure town in Connecticut.

Clergyman Reviews the Fight Pictures for the Moving Picture World.

Yes! I went to see the "fight pictures." A perfect cyclone of reasons surging around me demanded that I should go; not only must I see them, but sit in judgment upon them. I had an opinion, but opinions may be as variable as the winds. Also a prejudice, but prejudices are as valueless as a woman's "wills" and "wont's." To form a judgment could not be possible in any other way; I must therefore see for myself, even ignoring the newspapers, for some of them seemed about as sincere as Judas in the matter. In addition to being filled with my own reluctance and distaste, I was filled with everything "all the world" had to say in the way of "indecent," "immoral," "degrading," "offensive to public decency," "causes race riots," "creates disorder," "a public nuisance." What a mess of beastliness I was preparing for can be imagined. Steeling my mind so as not to be easily offended, trying to be thick-skinned, deliberately preparing for the most nauseating experience of my life, and actually trembling with a peculiar indescribable sort of inward fear, I went.

Please let me pause to say this is not about the fight or the ethics of fighting or boxing; this is solely about "the pictures."

Well, I saw them! As pictures are silent, it was not possible to hear any blows; neither could any blood be seen; and, save for the occasional sound of the "describer's" voice, all was silent, perfect silence. The predicted "disorder" did not materialize; strange to say, it was the quietest gathering I ever attended in all my life. There were no expressions of approval or disapproval, no applause of any kind whatever; this in a theater was indeed strange; a goodly number of men (respectable men, too), and a few women, and not a sound. Silently we looked on and as silently we passed out—absolutely quieter than a funeral. At a funeral there is a buzz of conversation, but in this instance this was lacking; we were all strangers, so we were all silent; even comments were inaudible. My experience to this point having proved so contrary to my expectations, perhaps my readers may ask if this exhibition was in some staid old country town? No, it was in the Borough of Brooklyn, in the City of Greater New York.

I do not know anything about fighting, but if those pictures showed fight, I have seen more fistic animation between two street urchins; nimbleness of feet seemed to cause more movement than anything else.

So surprised and impressed was I at the conspicuous absence of what I supposed would be blood-curdling fighting that I was constrained to count the time spent in the efforts of each combatant; discovering that actually two-thirds of the time not a blow was struck or even aimed; the men simply rested in each other's arms in a sort of pushing contest not energizing enough to be called a wrestle.

The "lecturer" told us "this was hard work and many an occasional punch was delivered which could not be detected." We had to believe this was so from the fact that it ended in a "knockout" wherein the pictures showed one man down for a few seconds and all was over.

Of the appearance of the men, the pictures showed nothing distressing (however much may actually have existed); the black man wore a continual smile which seemed to indicate complete self-possession throughout. The white man must have suffered temporarily or he could not have been "counted out," but there was no evidence of suffering in the pictures as he got up and walked away. Indeed, had I not known that it represented an actual fight I should have called it a fake or a "staged" play. I must say I have seen more revolting scenes in many pictures than were possible in these. I have already stated the effect upon the audience, therefore it only remains for me to pass my judgment upon the whole scene.

Fighting is a bad business throughout and I am not going to enter upon a discussion of its evil influence. The legitimate exercise of boxing is another thing. Fighting is the abuse of boxing.

It may be logical to say that if the actual fight is illegal, showing the pictures should be illegal; but having seen the pictures I can only come to this decision, in addition to my description; it is, that personally I have proved that a more degrading knowledge of the fight and a more demoralizing mental effect is caused by the descriptions in the newspapers than is possible by the pictures. The pictures show neither pain nor blood, the newspapers give harrowing details of both. If we are to stage or classify the evils of these fights, I should without doubt place the fight itself as the first and great evil, the newspapers' harrowing descriptions and details with exaggerations as the second or lesser evil, leaving the pictures to fall in line as the third or least evil. I desire not to be misunderstood as approving the pictures in any way. I am simply analyzing the situation and putting the three aspects of these matters in their relative positions.

Should the proper authorities deem it wise anywhere to suppress the pictures, they ought also most certainly to suppress the newspapers. It is hypocrisy for any paper to decry voiceless pictures while they give speech to blows and wounds and bloodshed in a manner so indecent as to cause the readers shuddering revolt. The revolt against the pictures is only natural after reading the papers, but I must in finishing say that whatever opinion may be formed by the pictures, the newspapers are worse.

The Motograph Company of America.

NEW PLANT AT BALTIMORE, MD.

A study of the Independent manufacturers' movement in this country reveals the fact that very seldom is a business started at the right end. In the last twelve months, as we have already pointed out in previous articles, something like twenty manufacturers have come into the field and it has been our duty to examine the plants in which they work as well as to criticize the pictures which they produce. These two circumstances are inter-dependent. It is necessary to have a good plant well equipped for the work and a good management in the laboratory and producing end; in short, having the necessary knowledge plus perfect facilities, this will further the production of good moving pictures which will succeed because they will satisfy the requirements of the public.

Some of the new manufacturers do not seem to have grasped the most essential part of this business. They have, as we know from personal observation, started in with poor, or rather incompetent equipments. They have engaged and relied upon cheap talent, which has not been first class, in the photography and producing. The result is, as our columns testify and the exchanges know, the production of very many moving pictures which are not up to the requisite standard of quality.

This week it has been our pleasure to inspect the new plant of the Motograph Company of America, of Baltimore, Md., and we are convinced that this company has started in at the right end; i. e., the very beginning. For manufacturing purposes they have located in a charming suburb of Baltimore, amidst open country which will allow of them producing beautiful outdoor scenes in very great variety. They have chosen a piece of ground upon which to erect, from the lowest brick of the base to the completion of their laboratory, an installation of every requisite for the production of moving pictures. Approaching the plant from the main road you get the impression of a country home to which a large studio is attached. Just as we write this article the workmen are in the last stages of equipping the plant in which, probably by the time this number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is issued, negatives will be in course of development. Neatness, convenience, and good order characterize the office part of the plant. We examined with some interest the entirely new studio, the room measuring, roughly, 70 x 40, admitting light from all sides and presenting the appearance so familiar to us, of a large photographic studio. Although glazed in the ordinary way, this fine place is screened, ventilated and lighted in a way that will give the photographer opportunity of producing a great variety of good pictures. The Motograph Company propose working by natural light, as the studio is far removed from any other building. Then again, we believe the actinic quality of the Maryland light is always good. The Motograph plant, we may say in passing, is well equipped in the matter of dressing rooms and other conveniences in making a picture.

We explored with interest and expectation the most important part of the moving picture plant, namely, the laboratories and dark rooms. Here we were very agreeably surprised to see in compact form one of the finest, cleanest, most economical systems of developing negatives and positives that we have examined. This system is under the direction of Mr. J. E. Rivoire, whose reputation throughout the country is that of a master of the work expected of a director of a moving picture plant. It would not be fair either to the Motograph Company or to Mr. Rivoire to particularize the details of the method adopted for developing and fixing negatives and positives, for tinting, and drying them. Suffice it to say that for this part of the work the trough system has been used. Briefly we may say that all the work is done in especially prepared concrete troughs sunk below the level of the ground so that an even temperature is always assured. There are minor details which are due to Mr. Rivoire which the company has adopted. The Motograph plant is one of the most efficient we have seen. It is such a plant, which, when in operation under expert direction, will produce pictures that in respect of photographic good qualities are bound to achieve the highest standard of excellence.

We are somewhat doubtful of the success of several Independent manufacturers for the reasons above given, but our inspection of the Motograph plant leaves us in no doubt at all of the capacity of this company, both in its personnel and its plant, for achieving a very marked success in the business of making moving pictures and of occupying a leading position in this great and growing industry. They have the plant, they have the organizing ability, they have the help, what is more, they have the appreciation of what a good picture should be: so success to them should be only a matter of time.

We might, in conclusion, state that the affairs of the company are in the capable hands of Mr. Harry R. Raver, who is well known to our readers and who has had much experience in the exchange and exhibiting ends. Associated with Mr. Raver are Mr. Elmer J. Walters, vice-president and secretary, and Mr. W. C. Hooper, treasurer. These gentlemen, with Mr. Rivoire as chief of the laboratory, constitute a highly efficient executive board which should make the fortune of the Motograph Company.

Finally, we might say that it is the intention of the Motograph Company, who are very shortly releasing, to send out none but the highest grade of pictures; to release only good, clean pictures closely acted, the kind of picture of which the American public seems never to tire. Equal care will be taken in respect to the other kinds, such as scenic and industrial or educational. We have no hesitation in recommending the releases of the Motograph Company of America to exchanges.

Mazeppa.

A lady recently asked me what I would do if I discovered a man making illicit love to a lady who was bound to me by marriage. "Shoot 'em both," says I, "shoot 'em both, very dead." "But what," remonstrated my fair interlocutor, "would be the good of that?" "Probably no good at all," was my reply, "but it would be my way of handling the situation." Tot homines, quot sententiæ. So many men, so many minds.

The mind of the count in Lord Byron's splendid poem of "Mazeppa" was clearly more original than mine. But, then, he had an opportunity of showing originality. He discovered the "goodly stripling" of the poem in love with his wife, and she with him. The count thereupon selected a very ingenious form of punishment for Mr. Mazeppa and presumably for the guilty wife. Ignoring my drastic shooting remedy, he chose a particularly subtle form of torture for the offending youth. He bade his menials capture a wild horse—"a Tartar of the Ukraine breed"—and to this animal he securely strapped the offending lover. Away bounds the wild horse into the illimitable Russian steppes. This part of the poem gives Byron the opportunity of writing some of his finest poetry. The wild horse ultimately falls dead, Mazeppa is rescued by kindly Russians to become a great Polish commander, and lives to tell his story in his old age.

"Mazeppa" was a favorite poem of mine in early youth. I presented it to an admiring public in the first theater I ever conducted. This theater, I may say, had a seating capacity of none; but it was complete in itself. I wonder if any of my older readers remember Webb of London, who made a specialty of toy theaters, measuring, we will say, about three feet across and four feet deep? You bought them complete with footlights, wings, proscenium and scenery, which you painted yourself; a book of words of the play; and all the characters which you painted, cut out, stuck on cardboard, in little metal frames operated from the side. I remember playing "Mazeppa" in the kitchen of my home to my mother and several small children, who hailed me as a great genius and prophesied that I would one day be famous. So I am. Probably it is all through Mazeppa, eh?

The clou of this play is the opportunity it gives a beautiful woman to play the part of "Mazeppa," to be strapped to the horse and to pursue her wild career over torrents, deserts and the like. I do not know whether Mazeppa was ever played on the ordinary stage in the United States, but I know that it used to be popular in the British Isles. Oddly enough it was an American girl who was the most famous Mazeppa of all time. Her name was Adah Isaacs Menken. She married, amongst others, Heenan, the "Benicia boy," who fought Sayers, the English pugilist.

Poor Menken has been dead these many years, but her name will live in history, first of all, as a magnificent Mazeppa, then as a woman of many marriages, then as the authoress of some very beautiful poems, when life began, for her eyes, to wear a somewhat sombre aspect. Peace to her ashes! She was a good soul. I was amongst her many millions of lovers, although when I saw her I was a very small boy.

Mr. Selig is always exciting my curiosity. I was curious to see what sort of a job he would make of "Mazeppa." There is only one word in which to describe the picture. It is characterized by all the Selig grandiosity. The story is handsomely mounted, it has distinction of acting and dress, the scenery is fine. If I throw out the personal impression that when "Mazeppa" was bound to the wild horse he accepted the situation tamely and did not look at all like a beautiful woman playing the part of a man, I have done with adverse criticism. Away went that wild horse. What a great piece of moving picture stage management this part of the play represented! The way the beast struggled when he was in the hands of the Polish servitors; the wild, fixed, determined way in which he sped over wild country, up and down hills, in and out of the lonely fastnesses of nature! All this seemed to me to breathe the true Byronic spirit. There was the "Mazeppa" man, strapped to the back of the animal, bearing it all like a (moving picture) martyr! He was a great man, that actor; I am curious to know who and what he is and how he felt when he was making that memorable ride!

To me this film of "Mazeppa" appealed as a very fine piece of work, indeed. I do not know whether the American people generally know the story. Those who sat around me in the theater where I saw the film did not seem to know it so intimately as I did. But, then, as I have already told you, "Mazeppa" and I have been friends these many, many years.

I am very glad indeed to see Mr. Selig tackling Byron. Lord Byron is my favorite poet after Shakespeare. I want to throw out a suggestion to the great Chicago film house. It is this: to take a further dip into Byron and give us "Sardanapalus" on the moving picture screen. Do, Mr. Selig! T. B.

Demonstration of Kinemacolor.

The first private demonstration of the wonders of Kinemacolor in this country was held on July 15 in the Pergola, Allentown, Pa., when the owners of the American rights to the pictures, Messrs. James K. Bowen and Gilbert H. Aymar, had as their guests several hundred of the prominent people of that city and neighboring towns. After it was all over the consensus of opinion was that there has never been anything like it and that it is one of the most wonderful discoveries of the age.

The invention is comparatively new to the world. Charles Urban and G. Albert Smith, of London, worked many years before they perfected it, and when they had it finished they came to New York last Winter and gave a demonstration in Madison Square Garden. Among those present was Mr. Aymar, a business man of Allentown. He instantly saw the possibilities of it in this country and secured an option at once. This option he and Mr. Bowen took up on their recent trip to Europe. The result is that they have the exclusive right in America and will manufacture the special projection apparatus in Allentown, which will also be the home station of the Kinemacolor. The factory will be at Union and Jordan streets and the office is at 942 Hamilton street.

Kinemacolor scenes are not pictures, but solid realities, the faithful re-creations of nature. They are in a category of their own. Their function appears to be the re-creation of nature as she is seen by the human eye, not from one point of view only, or at one moment of time, but from all points of view, and at all moments during the evolution of motion. It is difficult to explain how so simple a process succeeds so admirably in reproducing any and all the tints of solar refraction, and showing their constant variations. The fact is, many of the tints one perceives are accidents of preceding hues, throwing up their complementary colors, and thus contributing to a perfect whole. The lines and tints are produced by means of a color filter which though only composed of special tints of red and green reproduces all the other colors of the spectrum.

We understand that the Kinemacolor Company of America will consider offers for territorial rights.

CONCERNING THAT $100 ESSANAY WORD COMPETITION.

By Emar.

At last somebody has given practical evidence of realization that a proper term is needed to distinguish, in more fitting manner, the thousands upon thousands of places of amusement devoted to the exhibition of moving pictures. Not that this problem of a suitable appellative has not been thought of and discussed ere now, but it remained for the progressive Essanay Company to take the lead in a commendable attempt to relieve exhibiting houses of the nickel-odious and otherwise undesirable nomenclature in vogue.

Whatever the outcome of this competition may be, the Essanay Company will be entitled to the hearty thanks of all who are interested in the moving picture industry for the first real effort to discover a name that does not lead to the inference that a low price of admission is the principal lure to attract moving picture patronage.

Having given this matter of a suitable appellation much serious consideration, I venture to offer some observations in the hope that they may prove helpful in making a choice that will not be regretted. In the first place I would advise that the name to be selected does not bind the user to provide any form of entertainment other than the moving picture. But—however well convinced many are that the film pictures of good quality need no support; that vaudeville acts are not only a useless expense, but often a positive detriment, it is obvious that the word adopted must leave the user free to make his program with, or without, addition to his pictures. I think that I but echo the opinion of many in saying that a regular patronage, upon which so many exhibitors are dependent, is not gained or increased by "extra" attractions; that whatever improvement in attendance is attained is mainly, when not wholly, due to the quality of pictures exhibited by managers who are wise enough to study the preferences of their supporting clientele and who manage their houses in a manner to inspire respect and confidence. If exhibitors become more intelligently critical in ratio to the signal improvement in the quality of pictures now being produced—of which there is constantly augmenting evidence—the moving picture alone will very soon suffice to satisfy the public. This strong probability must be held in view.

Music being an imperative adjunct, generally understood to be a part of all entertainments, needs no consideration in the pending choice.

What is wanted is a word that will indicate a place where moving pictures are exhibited, but from which other attractions are not arbitrarily excluded.

Two words in general use the world over, having precisely the same meaning for all nationalities, are "theater" and "hippodrome." I mention these two words as the best examples of the kind of word to be desired. Distinct in their application to particular uses, both, nevertheless, legitimately admit a variety of performances.

What is wanted is a single word that is etymologically correct and that will fit the dignity to which the moving picture is so rapidly attaining as a large factor in education—no less than as the most popular form of public entertainment.

ACTOR JOHN AND HIS TRAINER.

It would seem that the "dog days" is just the right time
To indulge in a bit of doggerel rhyme.
So here's about "John," the Vitagraph pet,
As lordly a canine as ever you met.

John's no mere dog—John's a Vitagraph actor,
In "life portrayals" he's a notable factor.
If you doubt it just look at the consummate art
In "Uncle Tom's Cabin" displayed in his part.

But John was not always so docile a fellow;
He's black—and a fighter—and dogs that are yellow
Or white, they gave him wide berth.
If not their bravado was soon brought to earth.

But Trimball, the trainer, took John in hand;
Now see how confidingly close the two stand,
As Trimball rehearses the lines of a play
In which John, as star actor, will startle Broadway.

You may rave about Vitagraph girls and tragedians,
First and second rate actors, clowns and comedians;
Give me John every time; he'll not turn up his nose
At two bones a day when you ask him to pose.

CAVE CANEM.

The Agfa book of photographic formulas, edited by our friend, Mr. G. L. Barrows, is full of meat in the way of formulas for development of films, plates and papers. We see that every well-known brand of plates and films has its formulas represented. Moreover, there are many other formulas and tables ranging between a negative varnish and a list of handy emergency weights. The book is obtainable for fifty cents, from the Berlin Aniline Works, 215 Water street, New York City, and is well worth the money. We would recommend every one of our readers to get a copy of this book. We will say for ourselves in our own practical work, that it is likely to be exceedingly useful, because it contains much information of a standard character that we constantly wish to refer to.

AN EMPLOYMENT AGENCY.

From J. C. Barolet's Amusement Association, 569 Sixth avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., we have received a number of circulars setting forth the advantages of a bureau for supplying moving picture theaters with experienced employees. Barolet's Association agrees to furnish musicians, operators, cashiers, ticket takers, special officers, etc. As far as we can learn, the only expense is a membership in the Association, which costs a dollar a year, and no commission is charged either the employer or the employee for a booking if they are members in good standing. It is inevitable that some such organization should have been started to bring employer and servant together, and if Barolet's is conducted on the right lines and will fill the bill they will have the support of the Moving Picture World.

PARODIES ON THE BIG FIGHT.

Not to be outdone by their American cousins, several British manufacturers have seized upon the Johnson-Jeffries fight episode to perpetrate some really clever parodies. One manufacturer announces a boxing match between two black and white cats. From Kineto, Limited, 80 Wardour street, London, comes a circular of the "Grate Fight for the Championship," supposedly a scrimmage in rounds between a chimney-sweep and a baker, in which each participant changes color. Certainly these pictures will not be barred anywhere, and we are glad to see the British manufacturer come forward with some good comedies.

BROADWAY HAS ITS PICTURE HOUSE.

If a visitor to, or a resident of, this great city, New York, should be desirous of obtaining an hour or two of entertainment, consisting of moving pictures only, and not two or three acts of cheap, disgusting vaudeville, such as is generally run between pictures at the now so-called up-to-date moving picture theaters, he or she would have a hard time locating such a house.

The owners and managers of the various show houses have been approached through the columns of the Moving Picture World and asked to omit the vaudeville and try a show of pictures only, and as a result some have submitted to our request, and with a good list of feature films, which at the end are no more expensive, and probably not as much so, as the two or three acts of vaudeville put on, have been compelled to hang out the S. R. O. sign early and often.

The appearance of vaudeville, as a general thing, in the moving picture theater of to-day, originated in the larger houses, which, having been converted to moving picture theaters from the one-time vaudeville and drama play-houses, had the large, unnecessary stage room, and the managers of such houses, knowing with what popularity the moving picture had met with the entertainment-seeking public, and having before their minds the little success attained by their own shows, sought to run a double attraction, and thereby combined the two most popular priced entertainments, vaudeville and moving pictures

If you should walk from one end of Broadway to the other, and also on Forty-second street, two of New York's most popular theatrical thoroughfares, you will find but one, out of probably two dozen or more theaters, in which pictures alone are shown.

This martyr of theaters is known as the Times Square Theater, owned and operated by the Saxe Amusement Company at 1446 Broadway, between Fortieth and Forty-first streets.

Mr. Saxe, president of the company, invited the writer to visit his house while the entertainment was in progress, and I was struck quite favorably with the appearance of the building both inside and outside, and which I might state was recently reconstructed at a cost of ten thousand dollars.

The theater is attractive, though plain. Its walls, doors and ticket booth are void of all those lurid and vulgar posters. The interior decorations and frescoing are of pale green, and the electric lights are also protected by green shades, which renders a very pleasing effect to the eyes.

The house has a seating capacity of 300, and is never in darkness; the lights are always turned on, but so arranged as not to affect the picture. A double dissolving Motiograph moving picture machine is used in projecting the best licensed pictures, relieved by an occasional illustrated song.

We trust that the Times Square Theater will set the pace for other strictly moving picture theaters along Broadway.

ANOTHER KALEM INDIAN CLASSIC.

GIVING THANKS TO MANITOU.

A beautiful scene from "The Legend of Scar Face," a Kalem Indian mythological story. We reproduce it as a specimen of good photography and excellent pictorial composition.

In their search among the museums and libraries for Indian lore, the Kalem people ran across the legend of "Scar Face." It is a remarkable story, even among Indian legends, and the dramatic possibilities at once appealed to the Kalem producers. With their usual happy selection of location and suitable characters "The Legend of Scar Face" adds another to the long list of Kalem Indian successes. Also issued by them this week is "A Colonial Belle," a Revolutionary war story. We give an illustration from one of the scenes to show the infinite care that has been taken to get the correct setting and atmosphere of the period.

On another page will be found an article on the selection of natural scenic backgrounds for motion pictures by one of the "World's" staff of writers. Curiously enough, among the films of the week are several notable examples of excellent judgment and selection on the part of the producer. Biograph's "The Call to Arms," with its castles and Feudal customs, might well have been produced in the "old country" surroundings, it was so convincing. The Kalem Company, too, have a scout automobile, and on one of its trips discovered in Connecticut a mansion of pre-revolutionary days —a perfect specimen of Colonial architecture, which they used as a setting for "A Colonial Belle." The Vitagraph Company rounded up some very correct settings for "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and the version of the same story issued by Thanhouser also deserves mention for the local color they managed to get into some of the scenes.

Worcester, Mass.—Mr. Edwin W. Lynch, proprietor of the Pleasant street theater, has taken a 25-year lease on the Lincoln House. This old landmark is being demolished and Mr. Lynch will erect in its place a theater and roof garden having the largest seating capacity of any theater in New England.

Wausau, Wis.—The Electric Theater was damaged to the extent of $1,000 by the ignition of a film. A good sized audience filed out without any accident.

At last somebody has discovered that the motion pictures can be put to a valuable use. An official of a St. Louis asylum for the insane says they provide a cure for insanity. Some editors should be induced to frequent the picture shows early and often, particularly those who have essayed to champion the general interests of the moving picture business, but through their idiotic policies succeed in nothing more than prolonging discontent and strife to such a degree that even those who would like to be their friends have become disgusted with them.

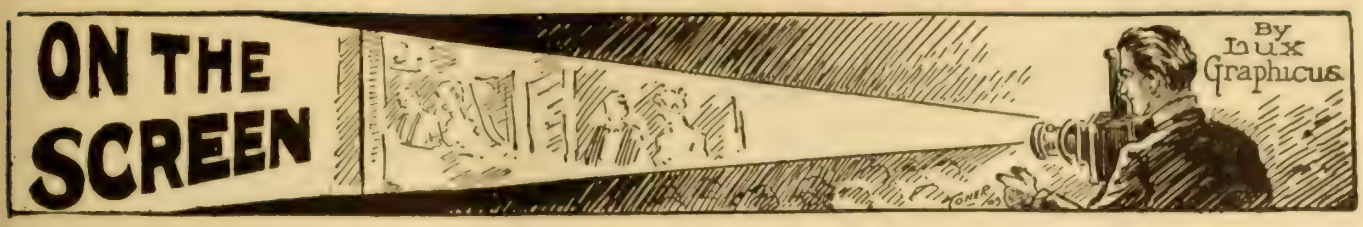
A number of exhibitors have asked me during the past week as to the status of the General Films Company. I regret to say I am not sufficiently in touch with the inside conditions on the licensed side of the fence to intelligently answer all the questions put to me on that point. I have endeavored to secure information from various sources to enable me to say something definitely, but have made little progress. The General Films Company, like many individuals, suffers from the heat to a considerable extent, and therefore is progressing by easy stages along the line of its policies. Every few weeks we learn that it has added two or three more exchanges to its fold, but nothing more is learned, and I do not think anything of very material importance will transpire before the Fall season opens. Thus far all the exchanges acquired are doing business at the old stand and to the casual observer there is no difference between the old system of management of these places and the present. Quite naturally there is some difference, but it is not observable to the outsider. Anyone who knows anything about the details connected with the operating of film exchanges is fully aware of the gigantic task the General Films Company has in hand and can readily see that it will take some time before it can accomplish what it has started out to do. An exhibitor said to me the other night: "Vell, I haf heered a grade deal aboud General Films bud I hafen't seen him yed. But I guess he'll come around in time and be on der job like the United Cigar Stores. I vonder if ve'll ged coupons mid der films ven he geds busy?"

The hot weather has put a big hole in the receipts of the moving picture places. Many managers have been obliged to shut down entirely. They tried to keep the doors open to hold the prestige for the opening of the regular season, but concluded that it was folly to pay expenses of film hire, help, electricity, etc., without a color of return at the box offices. Many of them have also been handicapped by air-dome opposition. The closing down of the places was the wisest move. Any good manager who has a good house in a good locality will get the business in the Fall without starving himself to death all Summer. The percentage of picture theaters that have closed is comparatively small. The principal sufferers are owners of the small places that no amount of investment could make sufficiently suitable for a place of entertainment in the Summer time.

I see that old stand-by, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," has come to the front again. This time Uncle Tom and Little Eva are starring in the moving pictures. Of all the plays of the last century I believe this one has been the greatest from the standpoint of an unrelenting hold upon the interest of the people. Dozens of companies are still producing it in the United States and Canada and I feel quite sure it will be a big success in the pictures. A singular coincidence is presented. Both the licensed and the independent people brought out the subject in the same week and on the same day. The Vitagraph Company has made it in three reels; the Thanhouser Company has condensed it into one reel. The story was told in one reel several years ago and I think the elaboration given it by the Vitagraph Company is a wise move. It will no doubt take a place with the biblical series and will be much sought during the coming Fall and Winter.

I was not a little interested the other day when a gentleman prominently identified with the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures told me with the greatest assurance that the pictures will be exhibited throughout the United States. I questioned his confidence in view of the numerous press reports of the prohibition spirit manifested in so many localities. He admitted that at first the prospects appeared rather gloomy, but as time passes, so does the opposition. He then gave me a new version of the situation. There is not the slightest doubt that more than a majority of the reported protests were without real foundation. They were floated for a purpose, which is obvious when it is stated that scores of people have called upon the promoters of the pictures with a proposition of this kind: "You know the people of our part of the State have barred out the pictures. Now I can overcome that. I am the only man who can. I know just how much strength the opposition has and my influence can open the way for the pictures in jig time. I'll guarantee to produce the pictures without molestation in my part of the State and anywhere within the State limits." It doesn't take a mind-reader to guess the rest. At all events the picture promoters have very wisely turned down all such overtures. One of them said to me: "We have a perfectly legitimate attraction and will offer it to the public on a legitimate basis. Wherever we find bona fide opposition we will submit gracefully to the conditions. We certainly will not enter into any influence game with anyone. If a city or town has been misrepresented, or the reported opposition is lacking the strength to bar the pictures, the people of that place will have a chance to see them. Of course, at present we are only disposing of State rights and will give those rights only on a basis that will remunerate us for the heavy investment we have made, cover the expenses of conducting the subsequent details and allow a fair profit on the whole. The pictures have been shown in New York City for almost two weeks and nothing has transpired to justify in the slightest degree any of the fears so vehemently expressed by the alarmists when their production was first arranged for. We have positive information that many people who at first objected to the exhibition of the pictures have changed their opinions after seeing the pictures and watching the deportment of the audiences. In one of the New York theaters I sat immediately behind two gentlemen, one of whom impressed me as being there in the capacity of a censor. I overheard him remark after the actual fight in the pictures had concluded, 'Well, I am opposed to pictures of that kind on general principles and I will not surrender my position, but I will admit that, aside from my views in this respect, I can see nothing objectionable.'"

I was very sorry that matters of pressing importance prevented my attendance at the convention of the Film Service Association in Detroit last week. But I was not the only one of the old-time attendants to be absent. By a peculiar combination of circumstances a number of exchange men who figured among the most prominent and popular members of the organization in years past were unable to attend. As I write these lines, my thoughts go back to the good old conventions in Buffalo, Chicago, Pittsburg and New York. How times have changed! We have seen the passing of Swanson, Cline, Laemmle, Miles, Steiner and ever so many of the members who were real good fellows. And they are still good fellows, but you all know they are not in the same ranks any more. Business conditions have changed, but whenever they meet the same glad hand is given. And as I go on thinking I ponder upon the future of the good old F. S. A. I fear it has not long to live. It may hold a few more conventions, but they will be few. It is now purely a social organization and as such has survived longer than I thought it would. But the social feature is not what I look upon as the ultimate agency of its disintegration. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the General Films Company will eventually have its system in full operation and that all the licensed exchanges will be within the fold. When that result is attained the Film Service Association will have but one member, if any, and that will be the General Films Company. There will then be no further need for conventions. I have in mind a possible successor to the F. S. A. The managers of the several exchanges may form an organization. Should they do so there may be some delightful reunions, but one spirit of the past will be lacking. The "boys" will not congregate as film exchange owners, but as employees. This may not mar the pleasure of the gatherings, but it will take from them a decided amount of independence that made the old-time conventions quite exhilarating.



Of all the means at hand for lowering the temperature during the recent torridity—splendid word, torridity, is it not?—none has been more efficacious to me than a visit to two or three moving picture theaters. Duty has taken me to Keith & Proctor's, on Twenty-third street, more than once, and I would like to compliment the manager of that house upon the admirable way in which the temperature is controlled, if controlled it is. A visit to this well administered theater has proven a panacea for the almost intolerable heat outside.

Part of one of the pictures that I saw was also so realistic that it still further operated to keep me cool and comfy. I allude to that phase of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," released on Tuesday, July 26, which shows the escape of Eliza and the child across the ice. This part of the picture seems to have been conceived and carried out with extraordinary realism. You see the snow falling, the ice floes cracking and moving, you felt the danger that the woman and the child were running as they made their escape across the ice, pursued by their remorseless enemy through the blinding snow storm. This is one of the finest effects I have seen on the moving picture screen, and the whole story, so far as I have seen it, is worked out with wonderful realism, effect and versimilitude. It is as good a rendering of the subject as I have ever seen, and I have seen "Uncle Tom's Cabin" played several times.

I was inquiring whether the subject of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" would go well in the South, and I was assured that it would. There are, then, evidently some aspects of negro life which do not excite racial antipathy. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is apparently one of them. I suppose this is in virtue of the fact that after all it is a very human story. It has a sentiment. There is no sentiment in a black man whacking a white man. But there is unquestionable sentiment, and much of it, in the display of the primal virtue which is one of the features of the story of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," namely, a protest against oppression.

Sentiment, too, plays a large part in another successful release of the past few days. I allude to "Peg Woffington," an Edison picture. This film was presumably adapted from the book by Charles Reade called, if I remember aright, "Masks and Faces." I remember to have met Reade. He was a splendid specimen of the vigorous English author. His book, entitled, "It is Never Too Late to Mend," helped to reform the somewhat brutal British prison system. Reade wrote the "Cloister on the Hearth," one of the finest historical novels ever written. This was in a way an attack on medieval priestcraft. In another book of his, called "Very Hard Cash," he fought the evil of the private banker, who, not being responsible to law, could easily make away with depositors' money. Another one of Reade's books that I always linger over with affection is "Christie Johnstone," in which Reade portrays the simple life of Scottish fisher folks.

Margaret (Peg) Woffington was a noted actress with a good heart, a tender solicitude for poor authors and a human attitude towards unsuccessful rivals. Marie Wilton, now Lady Bancroft, once played Peg and Sir Squire Bancroft, her husband, the sympathetic Triplet. The story was told in detail in last week's issue. I have just sketched it in a very brief outline.

* * *

I have read the book and seen the play and I was again curious to know whether the sentiment of the play had been preserved in New York and illustrated with the fidelity that one would look for, let us say, at the Haymarket, London. For the Haymarket, London, is the home of high class British comedy. There it is that your Trees, Bancrofts, Hares, Alexanders, Wallers, Kendals, together with many famous actresses, give you the sentiment of English comedy.

* * *

Can you transplant or rather transfer a sentiment three thousand miles? Can a group of American players, working up in the Bronx, put on a picture which should be as convincing to me, an Englishman, as if the thing were prepared in London? Apparently so. Costumes, acting, setting, the very bearing of the actors and actresses in this film seemed to be entirely convincing and, as I looked at the picture, I, to all intents and purposes, was seated in the orchestra of an English theater watching the representation of an English classic. Mind, I am giving an impression. I am not criticising in detail. Criticism in detail of a picture of this kind would be a somewhat different proposition.

This matter of the communication of the sentiment of the story to an audience is of supreme importance. Many of my readers, no doubt, have read Thomas Hardy's delightful story of English rustic life "Far From the Madding Crowd." A. W. Pinero, the British playwright, some years ago produced a play very like this called "The Squire," and in urging its claims to notice, he said he would give the scent of the hay across the footlights. In other words, he meant that the sentiment of this rustic drama would reach the audience. He did it. The play was very successful, in virtue of the fact that the actors and actresses felt the sentiment of their work and so conveyed their feelings in a special manner to the audience.

Not every moving picture succeeds in this country. The sentiment fails to reach the generality of the people. Let me make myself clear. What magnificent products reach us from Paris, and from Italy, Germany and elsewhere, and yet it would be inaccurate to say that these pictures which are exciting particular admiration are generally popular. This, I submit, is so because the sentiment of these pictures fails to be understood by the masses of people who pay to look at them. This, in a measure, may explain why it is that so many of these foreign pictures fail to reach general popularity. Good photography, good acting, good dresses, good scenery, all that is there, but the sentiment is not understood by the generality of American audiences.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Peg Woffington" may be regarded, therefore, as expositions of the sentimental side of moving picture making. Everybody understands the sentiment of "Uncle Tom's Cabin;" we feel we are with the characters. We do not like Legree; we commiserate Eliza and the old negro, we sniffle at the death of little Eva, we are amused by Topsy. The sentiment of the whole picture is simple and convincing. So, in a measure, is the sentiment of "Peg Woffington." A good feature of this play, the self-sacrifice of Peg, in the midst of many temptations and inducements to exult in her conquests, wins our affection at once. We love Peg Woffington for her lovableness. The sentiment of the story, in short, appeals to us all. She might have lived and had her day along Broadway. Nay, along Broadway at this moment there are probably clever and beautiful actresses who are passing through the same zone of experience as Margaret Woffington passed through. Indeed, I myself know—well never mind what I know. If I were to write down all that I know about this phase of life I should require to fill a very big book, indeed, instead of a single page of The Moving Picture World.

F. T. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., will on August 1 open the Amusu Theater of Jacksonville, Fla., having purchased it outright from J. C. Gray.

The name of the house, together with its policy, will be changed by the present owner. The theater will be strictly a moving picture house, the only other feature being high class singing. Several artists have been engaged, and will report for the opening performance on August 1.

All employes of this theater will be uniformed, and Mr Montgomery states positively that he intends to cater to the patronage of the ladies and children, and the high class element of the city. First class and latest films will be run.

The house will be remodeled and redecorated and carpets will be placed in the aisles. Mr. Montgomery expects to elevate the picture business in Jacksonville, as he did in Memphis, Tenn. He sold his Majestic Theater in that city

"As the Bells Rang Out" (Biograph)—A story which purports to be based upon some shady operations in high finance. Just as the bells ring for his daughter's wedding a father is arrested, and as the young couple, ignorant of this, depart on their honeymoon the father is led away to prison. The force of the story lies in the contrast, which is made real by setting one against the other.

"Serious Sixteen" (Biograph)—A lively love comedy. The young couple have a tiff, and she, sick of the world, decides to spend the rest of her days in the Salvation Army, and he equally discouraged, decides to become a friar. They both purchase elaborate outfits, manifesting extreme disgust with the world and its disappointments as they do so; but when this is accomplished their enthusiasm for immolation subsides. The lure of the world is too strong, and they decide to patch up matters and proceed along their former ways in mutual rejoicing. A continuous laugh.

"John Graham's Gold" (Lubin)—A story of a miser that is different. A love story and a woman who lost heavily on margins and borrowed of the miser to speculate are interwoven, while the sacrifice of a daughter to cover the mother's mistakes is an additional dramatic situation. To see the miser killed by an accidental shot from his own revolver is as unusual as it is strong. It forms a fitting climax to a story which holds the interest from beginning to end. The players have seized upon the situation with more than ordinary intelligent appreciation of the possibilites and have created a picture well worth seeing. It will rank as one of the leaders of the week.

"A Postal Substitute" (Melies)—A thrilling story of an attempt to prevent the delivery of a certain letter which is frustrated by a girl in a very romantic manner. The riding is perhaps the most entertaining part of the picture, though when Jack announces his intention of marrying May one wants to join in the vociferous cheering of the assembled cowboys. There is something about the picture, possibly the faithfulness and sturdy bravery of May, that appeals almost irresistibly, yet the story is simple. The heart interest is very strong, however, and once the story is opened it never ceases until the picture disappears.

"Mazeppa" (Selig).—A romantic story of a wild race. Mazeppa, the son of a Tartar chief, was captured in infancy by the Poles and grew to manhood supposing himself a Pole; but because he dared to love a Polish princess he was tied naked to the back of a wild horse, and underwent such tortures as few ever survive. But the horse took him to his father's camp. He was identified, proclaimed and immediately took measures to secure the princess for his bride, in which he succeeded. Few films are more fascinating than this. It is followed with the most absorbing interest, and one feels a thrill of pleasure when Mazeppa and the princess are re-united. The picture is staged with consummate care and all the details are carefully worked out. It is, perhaps, the strongest picture of the week.

"A Frontier Hero" (Edison)—A picturesque, though simple, story, dealing with events upon the frontier along in the '40s, when Indian attacks were common and no man knew when he and his family were safe. Indian attacks were such a constant menace that every family was in a continuous state of alarm, and the picture here offered illustrates graphically the unpleasant and dangerous conditions which existed. The Edison players have caught the spirit of the time and occasion and have developed a series of scenes which will linger long in the memory, and will give a more definite comprehension of what settlers on the frontier underwent. Not only is the picture entertaining, but because of its reproduction of a type of life fast passing away it possesses an important historic value well worth considering.

"Lazy Farmer Brown" (Edison)—Unquestionably the gentleman here represented was lazy. He demonstrated the fact very clearly in every movement, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say lack of movement. So the busybodies decided to arouse his flagging energies by a story of buried treasure. The result was so unexpected that they clearly show the chagrin they felt. But the erstwhile lazy man has no cause to regret the outcome of his development of unusual activity.

"The Cowboy's Sweetheart and the Bandit" (Pathe)—A picture filled with the spirit of energy which characterizes anything that faithfully represents cowboy life. While this house has never quite conquered some of the little details which are apparent to one familiar with cowboys and their ways, the actors accurately interpret the spirit which actuates the rangers of the plains and succeed in producing a fascinating film. This story is exciting, is well told and is sufficiently characteristic to be satisfactory. The perfect photographic features add so much to the attractiveness of the film that minor errors can be overlooked.

"Brave Hearts" (Kalem)—Every person who sees this film will be ready to cheer the brave little girl who mounts a horse and rides for aid when an Indian attack is begun. It is one of those characteristic Indian pictures which have come from the Kalem studio of late in such a high degree of excellence that every audience that has seen them has not failed to admire.

"Davy Jones and Capt. Bragg" (Vitagraph)—The third in the series of funny Davy Jones farces and, like its predecessors, filled with laughs from beginning to end. These two worthies are capable of producing the most uproarious laughter. They do it in New York audiences, some of which appear to be remarkably indifferent. This being true the effect of the picture upon audiences elsewhere may safely be left to the imagination. This one is, in some ways, the funniest of the three so far produced. Undoubtedly the public will look for more of the same type, representing these altogether likeable heroes in further amusing adventures.

"The Desperado" (Essanay).—A good story of the type which holds the unflagging interest of an audience. It deserves commendation because the usual flow of blood in stories of this character does not occur. The desperado cleverly captures the horses of the sheriff's posse and, confronting the men themselves one or two at a time, disarms them without firing a shot. It adds interest to the story to see the outlaw trail the horses and pistols all back to town, leaving the men to plod over the sands under a burning sun. Then comes a new man, who formulates a plan by which he takes the desperado single handed, and is made sheriff of the county for his good work. Numerous interesting details which add materially to the story are worked out as it proceeds. Most audiences will agree that this is one of the best stories of the kind the Essanay people have yet produced, and the good work they have done in this direction has long been recognized.

"The Princess and the Fishbone" (Gaumont)—A comedy in which good photography and lively acting combine to make a picture that brings many a laugh as it proceeds. It is funny without being silly, and is a relief to a program that is composed principally of heavy films.

"The Foxy Lawyer" (Gaumont)—A lively travesty upon what are supposed to be the foxy characteristics of some lawyers. To be sure the story is much exaggerated, but it is none the less funny for that reason. As a rule it will be found that audiences will unite in calling this a good picture.

"More of Betty's Pranks" (Pathe)—Another picture displaying more of the humorous antics of this individual. She makes it extremely lively for people in her immediate vicinity and adds materially to the gayety of the audience in doing it.

"Pete Has a Good Time" (Pathe)—Yes, he does, and in the representation of what he does the film offers an opportunity for a good deal of sport. Some of it is more or less uproarious. The situations are sufficiently complicated to make it interesting throughout the picture.

"Hako's Sacrifice" (Vitagraph)—A powerful Japanese drama worked out with such careful attention to details that one feels that for the time one must be in Japan. Staging and costuming have been carefully done, and the closest attention was given to the study of the details of the picture. Dramatically it will rank with the best of the week, and the actors perform their parts with skill and discretion. So far as the average person can see it has no flaw. The sacrifice, which is the basis of the story, is graphically represented, and one is disposed to feel a sense closely approaching gratification when it is accomplished and its necessity is comprehended. The actors deserve commendation for the sympathetic manner in which they interpret the play and one will want to see the film more than once.

"The Call to Arms" (Biograph).—Medievalism and covetousness, a combination common enough in the times so graphically reproduced in this film, are really the central points in this excellent picture. While the story has to do principally with a marvelous jewel, the real interest lies in the romance and mystery suggested by laying the scene in medieval times. Whatever relates to that period in the world's history possesses a peculiar fascination for everyone and this film will be watched with more than the usual interest for this reason alone. Perhaps the tragedy which results in the death of the wife could have been avoided by allowing her husband to arrive on the scene just in time to save her. Yet, possibly, the climax, the embodiment of vengeance as represented by the husband when he finds the false cousin cowering at the altar, would have seemed out of place or entirely unnecessary. Sometimes these suggestions would not work out satisfactorily. But often it seems a pity that a brave person, man or woman, cannot be spared after they have done as well as possible to save property or guard life committed to their care.

"The Stepdaughter" (Lubin).—One of those stories in which a wrong is righted and a little woman who has suffered all sorts of oppression comes to her own. Whether it is wise to represent stepmothers as heartless as is done in this film may be a nice question, but the fact remains that to do this is multiplying injustice. The larger proportion do as well as they can for the children brought under their care. That the story ends well is not due to the stepmother and her daughter. The telltale locket spoils their little scheme and the man of wealth and his boyhood sweetheart are united, to the discomfiture of the plotters who hoped to profit by the returned wanderer's long absence and consequent lack of knowledge of which was the right girl.

"Getting Even With the Lawyer" (Pathe).—A lively comedy which graphically illustrates how the lawyer was made to feel the effects of the wrath of some who believed he had taken undue advantage of them. Those who have had similar experiences may perhaps sympathize with the individuals who wreak their vengeance upon the lawyer.

"Breaking Up Ice in Finland" (Pathe).—An educational picture of merit. It not only shows a characteristic scene, but it does it in such an excellent way that one feels almost as though present and watching the actual scene in progress. Ice is a difficult subject to photograph. How difficult, any one who has ever used a camera can tell. Here the ice is faithfully portrayed, all the delicate half tones and shadows being retained. The viewpoints were selected with discretion, and altogether it is a very satisfactory picture.

"A Mad Dog Scare" (Selig).—A travesty upon the common hydrophobia scares which frequently beset small towns that will arouse any audience to convulsions of laughter. The way those two dogs go tearing through town, and the way the entire populace turns out will be appreciated by those who have seen a disturbance of any kind in a small village. Poor Josiah, bound to a chair pending the examination of the dog's brain, ceases to see the joke. Fortunately the dog had fleas instead of hydrophobia.

"A Sleep Walking Cure" (Selig).—To cure sleep walking the old maid conceives the brilliant idea of putting a tub of cold water at the foot of the stairs. It catches all but the right one; but when it captures a burglar they are all agreed that the old maid has brilliant qualities.

"Peg Woffington" (Edison).—A pictorial presentation of the long popular story by Charles Reade. Technically excellent, it is a notable addition to the already long list of Edison picture dramas. Whether it was that we were imbued with a sense of Edisonian greatness after witnessing such successes as "The Stars and Stripes," to cite a recent example, our imagination was keyed up to such a pitch as to what they could do with the dramatic possibilities in the story of the fascinating and erratic actress, that we regret to say we felt some disappointment. Not that they did not acquit themselves well but others agree with us that here was a chance for a masterpiece and "well enough" was not sufficient. The adapter of the story was the first offender and he or she was not improved upon by the stage director. The novel is a brilliant one, full of dramatic suggestion. Wealth and penury are contrasted; scenes of riotous extravagance change to those of hunger and misery; charity and goodness of heart is Peg's character at one moment, the next she is selfish and arrogant. But the point to have brought out was that, with all her faults, Peg Woffington was at heart a good woman. Now the Edison version only mildly brings out the costly dinners lavished on Peg by her admirers; the dramatic effect of the contrast between wealth and poverty is lost by presenting the poor playwright Triplet as too well-fed a character and in too comfortable surroundings. The contrasting qualities in Peg's character are not brought out strongly enough. So while we enjoyed the pictures, having read the book, and admired some of the clever work, yet the audience received it in silence, which would not have been the case had the dramatic moments been brought out with more intensity.

"A Fair Exchange" (Essanay).—An entertaining story of how a doctor got even with a plumber. The first part of the film is a travesty, showing in an exaggerated manner what a plumber is supposed to have done when called to mend a leak in a pipe in the doctor's house. The second part tells in a highly amusing manner what the doctor did to the plumber when the latter called for advice. The doctor has rather the best of it. When both are done with their work they exchange bills, and the humor of the situation striking them at the same time they burst into hearty laughter. And so does the entire audience. Like all the comedies from this firm's studio, this one is funny and lively and deserves the applause it will get.

"A Personal Matter" (Essanay).—Henry is up to his pranks again, and this time plans to answer a personal in the newspaper. But through a series of complications, as lively as they are funny, a tramp steals his suit and Mrs. Henry discovers what is doing. The tramp keeps the appointment and Mrs. Henry, mistaking him for her husband, administers such a severe drubbing that he wishes he had never discovered that personal. And then after the thorough keelhauling he gets he is dragged away by the police for stealing the suit.

"A Daughter of Dixie" (Kalem).—A love story with incidents of the Civil War as a background. Perhaps its most striking feature is the fact that the Southern girl, who turns her lover away when he decided to go with the North, accepts him after the war is over. And a further sentimental touch is added when the Union man and the Confederate shake hands and forget the past. Melodramatic in construction, this picture is interesting and perhaps more honestly represents the feelings of those actually engaged in that combat than almost anything seen in a considerable time. It is an interesting picture, but underlying the interest is a sentiment that is worth remembering and cultivating even now.

"The Detective's Dream" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy which represents, possibly, the supposed feelings of a detective who prides himself that he is capable of making important captures. What happens to this detective in his dream is amusing and the end is sufficiently surprising and funny to raise a long, hearty laugh, even in a New York audience.

"On the Ethiopian Frontier" (Pathe).—An excellent scenic production picturing some of the most interesting features of that distant and little known land, the character of the country, the people, their homes, their dress and many other interesting and instructive features are graphically reproduced.

"The Art Lover's Strategy" (Urban).—A touching little story depicting the struggles of a young artist. After selling his first picture he returns home to find a note telling him his wife is a suicide. But his wife is saved from committing the rash deed and the pleasant reunion planned provides a joyous ending for a film that opens gloomily enough to suit almost anyone.

"Mexican Domain" (Urban).—The views of Mexican life here presented are deeply interesting and instructive. They show many scenes of daily life, interspersed with pictures presenting the pleasure loving people in their gay recreations. Perhaps these latter will be considered the most attractive of all. The life of the streets of the city is clearly and graphically presented. One may acquire a reasonably accurate impression of Mexico by looking at this picture. The quality of the work done on it is excellent. Like all the Urban films intended to illustrate outdoor scenes, the operator selected the best possible viewpoint for each picture and all those who had to do with the mechanical department performed their portion of the work with skill and discretion. One acquires a clearer understanding of Mexican life by seeing this picture than one could obtain from a score of books.

"The Beautiful Margaret" (Gaumont).—So well known are the events which are developed in this drama that it is scarcely necessary to repeat them. Unless the drama is known this burlesque is silly and meaningless, but probably every one will know what is travestied as soon as it appears. Some of the play is performed by puppets in the hands of clever operators, and this novelty adds to the attractions of the piece. It should be a popular film.

"An Angler's Dream" (Gaumont).—How the fish turned the tables upon the man who fell asleep while trying to catch them. He manages to stand everything inflicted upon him, which, after all, is only what he would have done had he succeeded in capturing them, until they purpose frying him in a large spider. That is too much, and he wakes up, only to discover that a huge fish has been hooked which disappears with his line.

"Making Wooden Shoes" (Gaumont).—Here are two decided novelties, first the rapid development of the shoe from the block of wood to the finished product, and that, too, by means of the most primitive tools. To some it will be a novelty to see oxen shod by swinging them clear of the ground, but that was always done in New England, and is to-day. It is impossible to break oxen to be shod like horses, consequently this method must be used. It brings to America an old-world industrial process which may be the precursor of the same operation in this country.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" (Vitagraph).—The first of a series of three reels, each approximately 1,000 feet, and intended to adequately present this powerful and fascinating drama. This reel depicts the escape of Eliza and the removal of Uncle Tom from his old home in Kentucky. Most of the salient facts in the story up to that point are graphically produced. It is scarcely necessary to go over the story. It is well known to practically every one. The staging is adequate and the actors have caught the spirit of the original story and develop their parts with a skill and intelligence which must be seen to be appreciated. While the story has lost most of its power with the removal of the reason for its existence, it still has a fascination which few are able to resist, and in this film that fascination is retained. It is a picture of power, and deserves all the applause which it receives. The producing firm deserves commendation for the sympathy and excellence of its work.

"Andromache" (Film d'Art)—An artistic production which will rank among the many beautiful pictures sent out by this house. All the details are worked out with skill and intelligence. The stage setting and costuming are alike especially attractive. The film has many delicate beauties.

"The Mistake" (Imp)—A love mix-up in which a girl marries a man she does not love, and trouble follows. Wrongfully accused by her husband, she goes back home. Ultimately, however, he learns the truth and begs forgiveness, and afterward they live happily. The story is interesting for what it suggests, more than for what it actually tells, and the audience follows it with close attention throughout.

"Black Pete's Reformation" (Bison)—Here is a sermon so graphic that its meaning cannot be mistaken. Black Pete, a desperado, given to holding up coaches and robbing the passengers, reforms through the efforts of Julia, a country girl, whose father has died, leaving her alone. The dramatic feature of the piece is Black Pete's reformation. The scene of the prayer at the grave is impressive, and, unlike many similar scenes, does not seem sacrilegious. This film could be used by any moral teacher to emphasize his arguments in favor of redemption, no matter how wicked the individual might be.

"A Devoted Little Brother" (Lux)—A beautifully photographed and highly dramatic film, representing a boy, no more than a child, seizing his violin and roaming from place to place, playing a familiar tune in the hope of thereby discovering his kidnapped sister. And in this he is successful. He finds his sister, and secures the punishment of the villains who took her away. The child actors perform their parts with distinction, making the film especially attractive. Child actors invariably attract favorable attention, and in this instance there is no question about the excellenc of their work.

"Ma's New Dog" (Lux)—A novel development of a love story, which presents a hard-hearted mother as objecting to the attention a devoted admirer is showierng upon her daughter. The result is that he is incontinently turned out of the house. Disguising himself as a poodle he returns and is duly installed in Ma's affections. Ultimately he succeeds in winning over the objecting mother, and purchases her a real poodle to take the place of the fake she lost when she found a son-in-law.

"The Playwright's Love" (Thanhauser)—A pretty love story, beginning when an unsuccessful playwright succors a poor woman and brings up her daughter. In later years they marry, ending pleasantly a romantic episode.

"The Elopement" (Great Northern)—A lively comedy in which the laughable situations into which the elopers are plunged do not fail to interest and amuse. It is acted with all the snap and enthusiasm which characterizes the work of this capable company.

"The Stolen Policeman" (Great Northern)—The adventures of this unfortunate policeman are most laughably presented and the audience is treated to a picture lively enough to suit the man who wants action in everything he sees.

"Our Housemaid" (Powers)—A rough-house picture, depicting the results of a series of tricks by Katie, the housemaid. She gets hers in return, too, but the worst comes when the cook seizes her and thrusts her head into a quantity of pudding. While the picture is rough, it is also funny, and roars of laughter usually greet its presentation.

"Cohen and Murphy" (Powers)—A bad man story which represents Cohen as avenging the death of his partner and friend, Murphy, by getting the bad man drunk, binding him fast and carting him back to town like a log. Then he presents the assembled cowboys with a long rope, an action which carries its own plain inference, and no explanation is necessary. The picture is notable in that it offers a novel method of disposing of bad men which might be used to advantage in real life. It would save powder and lead, and offers a quiet substitute for the usual noisy row.

"The Ungrateful Daughter-in-Law" (Yankee).—An object lesson which has too many counterparts. More than one daughter-in-law has turned a son against his mother and this one is no exception to the instances which have gone before. Driven to despair the old mother seeks relief in suicide, but is happily saved, and then the reunited family begins to truly live. The picture is graphic and the inference is sufficiently plain. The unfortunate feature is that it represents a condition that exists in too many instances.

"Two Maids" (Imp).—A lively comedy representing two visitors applying for and getting the places of serving maids. Many funny complications arise, but the climax is reached when the fiances of the two supposed serving maids unexpectedly arrive with the master of the house for dinner. Explanations follow and the company is as happy as though all the maids in the universe were within call.

"The Silversmith to King Louis XI." (Eclair).—A romantic love story in the setting of royalty. There are a number of disagreeable interludes, but ultimately the couple is united by order of the king, only as a punishment for daring to make love. In that manner they are forbidden to marry for a year. The setting of the play adds to its attractiveness and one acquires an accurate impression of life in those times by seeing this picture.

"Love in Mexico" (Bison).—A love story in which a stern father objects to a poor lover, but favors the suit of a man who offers gold for his daughter. But she escapes from their clutches and leads them a merry chase to her sweetheart's hut; then the two of them hurry to the priest to be married. The wealthy suitor is sent about his business without either girl or gold and the father gives the newly wedded pair his blessing. The story is lively enough, but possesses no novelty, and has nothing beyond the ordinary run of such events to recommend it.

"The Missing Bridegroom" (Powers).—Here is a medieval romance with a twentieth century setting. The bridegroom is stolen on the hour of his wedding and confined in a dungeon, while his captor makes love to the girl, finally winning her consent. The prisoner escapes, however, and arrives at the church in time to prevent the wedding. Then the situation changes, and the kidnapper is led away by the police. To bring a story like this down to these times is a worthy achievement. The producers have accomplished it with remarkably good taste and with surprisingly few points open to criticism.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" (Thanhouser).—An attempt to reproduce in one film a reasonably accurate condensation of this novel. It is needless to go over the story; every one knows it, either by reading, or by hearing about it from others, and as one scene after another passes before one on the screen the memory reverts to those other days when all this was true, now, happily, gone forever. It is well, however, to reproduce in this graphic form some of the horrors which were formerly perpetrated in the sale and cruel treatment of slaves, that the younger people may become acquainted with what occurred for many years in the South. They will know what the Civil War meant, and will realize why it was necessary to shed so much blood and spend so much money to save the Union.

"The Room of the Secret" (Ambrosio).—A melodramatic film telling the story of a dark secret and holding the interest throughout without flagging. Acted with appreciation of the possibilities of the picture, it will prove an interesting addition to any program. The technical part of the work is well done.

"A True Pal" (Nestor).—An exciting story of what happened when a girl came between two old friends. Then came a quarrel and an accident with a pistol, wounding one of the men. The other was accused of shooting his rival. He got away with his sweetheart's help. The wounded man recovers sufficiently to know what has happened, crawls upon his horse and rides furiously to his friend's rescue. He arrives just in time. The rope is over the limb, but explanations clear up the misunderstandings and everybody is happy, even the unsuccessful man rejoicing over his pal's good fortune.

"The Prospector's Treasure" (Atlas).—A love story which is marvelously helped by the discovery of a prospector's hoard of gold dust, hidden in a tree for sixty years. It prevents a marriage for money and gives two lovers their opportunity. The climax, when the banker arrives to claim his bride to find her the wife of another, and also to receive payment on his mortgage, is excellent and is a pleasant ending to a film that had gloomy possibilities. Actors and technical men have done their parts well and the picture should prove popular.

NOTES FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. Tom Moore, manager of the Film Exchange of Washington and vicinity, is enjoying a much-earned vacation for a fortnight, visiting New York and Atlantic City. He is supposed to forget business during this time, but he will be seen among the managers of New York on social calls, during which business will be sure to crop in somewhere. During his absence Mr. Wm. Mack is at the helm at the exchange here and things are running on as smooth as ever.

A big event among the patrons of moving pictures is the Howe's Travel Festival at the Columbia Theater. Lyman H. Howe has done much to assist the stay-at-homes in enjoying experiences in foreign lands without any of the discomforts of the traveler. He was one of the first men to eliminate that uncomfortable flicker of the moving picture and his reels are noted for their clearness and his subjects are always interesting. The serious, the humorous and the instructive are harmoniously blended.

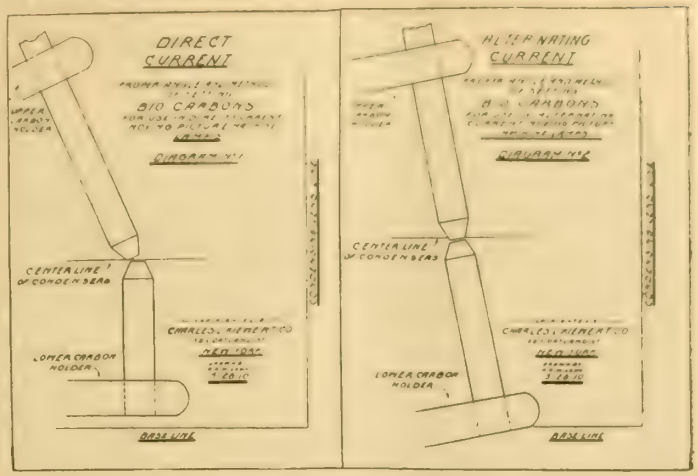
Manager Gwynn of the "Nameless" Theater, is having a unique contest to secure a title for his moving picture house, by letting the patronizing public select the name. Thousands of names have been received and it will be no easy matter to make a decision. If only a partial list of these titles are published the public will gain some idea of the wide range of ideas that have come into the heads of the patrons of this theater. Mr. Gwynn is at the head of one of the prettiest houses that shelters motion pictures in the national capital. He is a newcomer here, being better known for his houses in Allentown, Pa.

The significance of good music to accompany picture plays is becoming more and more apparent. A theater that appreciates this is The Empress, which has as many patrons for its music as for its pictures. I dropped in there recently and was somewhat astonished to hear "The Barcarole" from the opera of the "Love Tales of Hoffmann" being played in a truly artistic style. This strain continued during the love passage of the motion play, but as soon as the theme of the story changed so did the music, both working in harmony during the entire performance. "It pays to have good music," remarked Mr. Notes, and other managers here have expressed the same opinion. W. H.

NOTABLE PATHE-AMERICAN FILM.

The accompanying illustration is from a scene in "The Cheyenne Brave," one of the most, if not the most, remarkable Indian pictures ever produced. In one of the scenes there is a canoe chase with fifteen canoes taking part. All the actors taking part in this picture are real Indians or sufficiently well made up to pass as such. The film will be issued on August 19 and should be in great demand.

CORRECT SETTING OF THE CARBONS.



We have just received from the Charles L. Kiewert Co., 39 Cortlandt st., New York, a copy of the new instruction sheets which they are using in connection with the Bio carbon, noted in our columns recently. As this pamphlet contains many items of value and interest to every owner and operator of a moving picture theater, we are giving below some extracts from the contents. The use of 5/8-inch cored carbons, both upper and lower, on both alternating and direct current, is advised. This is different from the usual practice, but as the Bio carbon is especially designed for motion picture work by the largest manufacturers of high-grade carbons in the world, we have no doubt that the direction given will be found correct. In view of the rapidly increasing sales of Bio carbons, every operator should be familiar with their use. The use of one size of carbon for both upper and lower, and for all conditions, will interest both the theater owner and the jobber or distributing exchange, as it cuts in half the number of different sizes which must be kept on hand. From the standpoint of the user, a further economy results, as partially burned upper carbons may be used as "lowers" instead of being thrown away. The plates showing the setting of the carbons are simple and effective and should be of great assistance to the operator, and the directions accompanying them are both clear and comprehensive.

The directions for altering the carbon setting to suit various frequencies on alternating current are especially useful. We have never seen anything of this nature in print before and doubt if any instructions on this point have ever been made public. The writer of this instruction sheet is evidently thoroughly familiar with the practical operation of moving picture machine arc lamps, and has put a great deal of study upon usually neglected points.

There are several little "kinks" that are calculated to help the operator in overcoming difficulties that are often met, but not always eaasily removed. The statement that 5/8-inch cored Bio carbons will carry up to 100 amperes is certainly startling. It is so far in excess of the capacity of any other carbon that, were it not attested by the experience of several competent practical operators, we should be inclined to view it with scepticism. Many operators will find the advice regarding current saving devices especially helpful. Improperly adjusted devices of this character are to blame for more arc troubles than is generally suspected. We might add that every operator should know the proper arc voltage for the carbons he is using, and test the same by voltmeter while adjusting the current saving devices, especially on alternating current.

The Charles L. Kiewert Co. had made an innovation in its business policy which will no doubt be warmly welcomed by our readers. An expert department composed of practical operators, will be maintained for furnishing, without charge, advice upon all practical and technical points in motion picture projection. This is a step in the right direction. It cannot be denied that during the past ten years, while the art of moving picture projection was developing rapidly, the source of light upon which the picture depends underwent practically no improvement. In fact, the most frequent criticism of moving pictures from the artistic standpoint, has been the "flatness" of the picture, which is undeniably traceable to the carbon, as is easily seen by comparison with stereopticon pictures projected by calcium light. If, as claimed, the Bio carbon will furnish a light of calcium quality, its invention marks a new era in the moving picture art.

OPRATORS' COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Kind Words—New Screen.—Mr. Lester B. Hughes, Stroudsburg, Pa., writes: "One of the first sections of the Moving Picture World that claims my attention is the department over which you preside. Stroudsburg and East Stroudsburg, population 10,000, has four picture shows, the largest being the Grand Opera House, managed by O. F. Koch, seating capacity 500. Mr. Koch is an up-to-date manager and has perfected a new screen, applied for patent and made arrangements to place same on the market. It will be comparativly low in price, thus being within reach of every nickelodeon. I have seen pictures projected on Mr. Koch's screen, and they certainly were a revelation, economy of light being the main feature. Mr. Koch tells me he formerly used sixty amperes and gets 100 per cent. better picture now with twenty. I am in no way associated with Mr. Koch, or in any way interested in his screen, except that I always like to see anything good succeed."

Glad to know you appreciate and like the Column, Neighbor Hughes. Many thanks for your kind words (and for the invitation). As to the screen: we are always glad to learn of new things that go to improve the silent drama. I'm afraid, however, the claim of sixty to twenty amperes is a little strong, provided the size of picture remains the same. I have said from the first that the ultimate gain by use of patent screens reflecting light would be largely confined to current saving; that by their use the same curtain brilliancy might possibly be had with fifty per cent. less current. Of course there may be picture improvement also, to some extent. I shall be interested in seeing the new screen when it is on the market.

Discovered.—A letter from the manager and operator, Belfast Opera House, Belfast, Me., says that a Mr. Young is quite young. In fact, he is only a boy, who asked the privilege of learning operating, was accommodated, loaned the back numbers of the World and at once burst into print, warning the editor that his "slats" were in danger. Mr. Clifford, manager and operator B. O. H., says kind words about the World, the Column, and advised that its editor pay no attention to kids. Neighbor Clifford begins his letter "Friend Richardson," and then apologizes for the familiarity, but says he would like to use the term, because he knows I am trying to uplift the picture business. Now that is precisely what I want! I desire the operators, and managers, too, to consider me their friend. I wish it understood that even when I roast the tar out of you it is rather like the chastisement administered by the father to the child he loves. It is my earnest desire to do all I may to elevate the moving picture business, for its welfare lies near my heart. I recognize the fact, which too many who should know better ignore, viz: that no matter how perfect the film, the machine and equipment, the production will be ruined by poor performance on the part of the operator, and that if the film be mediocre and the machine and equipment not of the best, the poor operator will produce results on the screen calculatd to cause tearsdisgustlaughterswearwords and a few other things all mixed up together, while the real operator can put on a quite passable performance with the same material. Therefore, perfection on the part of the operator is of crucial importance to the business as a whole. I am trying, among other things, to bend my humble talents to the raising of the standard of performance on the part of operators, and you can make me no happier than to tell me I have actually made some degree of headway. "Friend," Neighbor Clifford, is the term I like to hear! If you lost your back numbers of the World just let us know and we will gladly replace them.

General License.—In a just discovered post card, which seems to have been mislaid, Iron River, Mich., asks for full, complete instructions for procuring a license permitting an operator to travel from place to place.

So far as the writer knows there is no such license. Iron River also promises some articles on the "Rheostat Question." Glad to have them sent in, Iron River. Sorry for delay answering license query.

Editor's Judgment Endorsed.—Mr. H. F. Jackson, resident manager Bijou Amusement company, Fitchburg, Mass., writes in part: "Just a word in commendation of your article regarding Keith & Proctor's Harlem Opera House. A recent trip to New York City occasioned visits to some thirty of the so-called moving picture theaters of the Big Town. The above-named house was the only one in which the performance did not cause sighs of regret for the money expended. The new films, uniformed attendants, illuminated auditorium seen at the Harlem were most unusual for a New York house, while the fact that not only did the machine actually not break down during the show, but the pictures were brilliantly and evenly illuminated, was positively unique. The only fault I observed was the odd shape of the picture, wider at bottom than top, but the distortion was slight and would not be noticed except by the most exacting critic. I may possibly be prejudiced, but it seems to me that the average large-city exhibitor might learn much from the methods in vogue in Massachusetts. More power to your Operator's Column. As a suggestion I have not seen made: Troubles in focusing both sides of the picture may be caused by the front-plate not being parallel with the aperture plate."

The suggestion is good, Neighbor Jackson. Since I first visited the Harlem Opera House I have been there many times, and in no case have I felt called upon to feel sorry for commending that house, its manager and operator. The slight distortion is unavoidable, caused by machine being located higher than the curtain.

Has the Right Ring.—Mr. P. H. Brown, Hugo, Okla., writes a letter which sounds right, and if his deeds back up his words, as doubtless they do, Neighbor Brown is a real operator. The letter runs thusly: "I note, in last week's paper, a Mr. A. M. Young attempted to get back at you for roasting the poor shows and operators. May I ask a question? If the operator has not pride enough in his business to do the best possible work—produce the best possible results on the screen—why should he not be roasted? That is largely the trouble with the silent drama of to-day. Too many of the Dont-Care brand of operators! But I am pleased to be able to say that in the West and Middle West the great majority of operators take pride in their work, and most of them have pretty fair conditions to work under. By this I mean large, well-ventilated operating rooms. I do not assert that all are so fortunate but that the majority, in the sections I have visited (and that includes Canada to the Gulf and St. Louis to the Atlantic a few times) are thus favored. My operating room here is 8x10, with a nine-foot ceiling. It has three outside windows and complies with all underwriters' rules. I wish you might visit us some night. I don't think you would have any complaint to make for The Erie (the name of the theatre) has a reputation all over Oklahoma as being the most beautiful house and as putting up the best pictures of any in the State. We are keeping up that reputation, too. The trouble is, Mr. Richardson, that you don't roast those houses and operators who put on rank performances hard enough. If every operator would bend his entire energy towards improving his performance you would soon see a vast change for the better in the Silent Drama. And you can improve, gentlemen, if only you will make the effort. Now let us all place our shoulder to the wheel and shove for better projection (Amen.—Ed.). I won't consume more space now, but the foregoing sets forth just the way I feel about things, and I just had to say it. Now, Mr. A. M. Young, please give reasons why Crank Turners should not be roasted. What's the matter with you other Oklahoma boys. Wake up and let us hear from you!"

Mr. A. M. Young's letter was a joke—and I rather think that he is sorry he spoke. I merely published his literary effort for the laugh there was in it and to teach him, and others like him, a lesson. Friend Brown's letter requires no comment. It speaks for itself.

Film Cement.—Mobile, Ala., asks for formula for film cement, both ordinary and N. I. The formulas for the best cements, especially the N. I., are trade secrets. I cannot recommend others. You will find the Pathe cement excellent. Their N. I. cement will answer for both N. I. and ordinary.

Wires and Carbons Too Small.—Charlotte, N. C., writes as follows: "Have a Compensarc giving 30, 50 and 75 amperes. Our main wires to Compensarc are No. 4, and from there to lamp is No. 6 asbestos covered cable. After running a short while the latter gets very hot. Our carbons are electra and they burn to a long, sharp point. We cannot account for this unless the carbon is too soft. If this is the case can you refer me to a grade of carbon that will carry 75 amperes? If this is not the reason can you tell me what it is. Also when lamp is burning there is a loud buzzing sound. I enclose envelope for reply and thank you in advance."

My groceryman and landlord absolutely refuse to accept thanks. They tell me that nothing on earth but coin of the realm will answer, and I could employ all my time and the time of at least one stenographer answering personal letters for which non-current thanks is the pay. Enclose at least one dollar for personal replies. Your trouble is simple. By reference to underwriters' tables you will discover the fact that No. 6 wire is 26,250 circular mills in area and is rated to carry 40 amperes with rubber covered insulation or 65 with weatherproof insulation. You are therefore overloading the wire by fifteen amperes, or maybe more, since the 75 ampere output of the transformer is not accurate, but merely closely approximate. It might, of course, be somewhat less and will vary every time the mainline voltage varies. Larger wires from Compensarc to lamp or double the No. 6 is the solution, of course. The same is true of the carbons. You do not say what size carbons you are using, but I assume them to be five-eighths. These are too small for 75 amperes of current. Use ¾-inch carbons instead; soft, cored, of course.

Wrong Condensers.—Green Bay, Wisconsin, writes: "My picture on the screen, right in the center, always has a blurred, faded blue-like spot. Kindly explain trouble and oblige."

This is absolutely all the letter, except the address and signature. Now, Green Bay, I want to help you, but cannot do much on data of that sort. In all human probability your condensers are of wrong focal length. Try moving your lamphouse back. If that don't overcome the trouble tell me the following: what kind of current have you. How far from curtain to lens and how wide is your picture on the screen. But you might do some experimenting on your own hook if the moving of the lamphouse back don't answer. Get a pair of 7½ and a pair of 6½ condensers. Put in the 7½ first. If the trouble is still there try the 6½. If still there try one 6½ and and one 7½, 6½ in front and then the 7½ in front. One of those four combinations should fix you all right, provided there is nothing else wrong.

Haw! Haw! Haw! which is caused by Anthony, Kansas', description of a rival show, as follows: "Opened here July 4 and have done fair business, even though the weather man has tried to melt everything in sight. We have a fairly good ventilation system—that's the secret. Previous to our coming there had been four or five "picture shows," none of which made good. The one who was here when we came was sure some class! He plastered houses all day and ran the show at night, losing on the show what he made during the day at the trowel. His picture consisted of a visible patch in the center of the screen. He sprung a new one on me, however. I tell it for the benefit it may be to others: when the song was running he had a girl stand at the door of the booth and yank the operator's pants leg when it's time to change the slide. After the song he would switch on the house lights, stick his head out of the booth and request the audience to wait a few minutes while he put in a new reel, which operation usually consumed five minutes. Please don't imagine that we have the best theater in the country, or that I think I am the best operator on earth from what I have said about our competitor. I am merely trying to give you some idea of the class of work found in many small cities in Kansas. I enclose you couple of views of the theater. I would like to ask your aid in the following: Have a ——— machine. When framing lever is in central position I get good, clear picture. When framing carriage is clear up or down, however, there is travel ghost on upper left hand or lower right hand corner, as the case may be. Can this be remedied?"

The trouble as caused by the fact that the shutter travels with the framing carriage, therefore in different relative position to the aperture plate at different positions of the framing carriage. You could possibly remedy the matter by making the shutter a trifle longer, provided there is clearance enough to allow of it. Probably there is not. It is also possible that the shutter is a trifle too narrow, in which case you can remedy matters by riveting a narrow piece on one side and resetting the shutter. If what you see is merely a blur in the corners it would indicate shutter too short, if it really is a travel ghost then it is too narrow. To remedy the latter condition will sacrifice illumination, of course. The pictures show a nice little house, and if you have many young ladies like those shown I think I shall move to Anthony myself.

A Corking Good Letter.—Mr. F. A. Wright, Greenville, Miss., writes a letter which is perhaps the best that has ever reached my hands, since it gets right to the hub of several things and gets to it straight. I'd like to shake hands with you, Neighbor Wright; I certainly would. Thus runs the letter: "I am not a writer and do not butt into quill-shoving very often; but as I cannot get within talking distance I will try it once. Having thusly made due excuse I will now proceed: Some time ago I read a letter in a trade paper (?) under the heading correspondence, stating that conditions in the operating room are on the average (writer names a place where brimstone is supposed to be plentiful, and where poor operators will "get theirs" some day), with a double capital H. Now, my experience has been that such is not the case unless the operator himself is lacking in backbone, or just naturally likes such conditions. If the operator can deliver the goods he can get an operating room a little larger than 4x4x5 feet (Wright means he can get a job where there is a real operating room, I take it.—Ed.), and he can also work for a manager who will furnish all needed supplies. As for going for the films: errand boys are cheap, and besides the operator is employed as, and supposed to be, a mechanic, not a messenger kid. The only man I blame for submitting to cracker-box operating rooms from nine to twelve hours a day at from $12 to $15 per week is the operator (?????) himself. If the operator is the hardest worked, poorest paid and most abused man in the show business he has but himself to thank, and it is sure time to tackle some other trade. That is what I will do when I find it that way, and do it P. D. Q., too! My experience is that managers, if they be real managers, who have the good of their show at heart, always consult with the operator as to the purchase of supplies, or leave such matters to him entirely, in which latter case it is the operator's own fault if he gets stung. There, I have that out of my system and feel better!

In The Moving Picture World, July 2 issue, Homer, Ill., sends two diagrams for connection of rheostats on 550 volt pressure. If he gets better light, or more current, from No. 2 than from No. 1 he has, I believe, put one over on Ohm's Law which, if I rightly remember, is stated $C = \frac{E\,M\,F}{R}$. The series resistance (R) is the same and the voltage (E M F) does not change, so why does the current change? (In No. 2 he has more total resistance than in No. 1, which makes Homer's case all the more queer.—Ed.) Does the holding of a New York license denote that the holder is a competent man? If so, what does the operator who does not know the things set forth in letter going to do when he is employed and instructed to oversee the building, wiring and general furnishing of the operating room? (This isn't quite clear, Friend Wright. To what letter do you refer?) Suppose that he is out of employment and gets a hurry-up call from an exchange and half an hour later finds himself on board a train bound for some village a hundred or more miles away, with the assurance ringing in his ears that "everything he can possibly need is in the trunk in the baggage coach ahead." But when he arrives at his destination, three hours before time for the show to open, finds that the Knowledge Box at the exchange has, in his hurry, forgotten the rheostat (mere trifle), the machine handle is broken in three pieces and the hall is wired for ten sixteen-candle-power lights, country style, with No. 14 wire and just to give him wings he is promptly informed that the society paying for the outfit has sold five hundred seats at 25c. and guaranteed a show on that particular night!!!!! Granted that such as the above may happen but once in a lifetime (it used to be all too common just a few years ago.—Ed.), yet I have seen it happen that once, and the show go on on schedule time. The electric light company had plenty of No. 00 wire, if that would do? It did! The grocer loaned a pickle keg, the blacksmith a couple of plow-shares, which combination, together with water, was the rheostat, and the blacksmith made a crank that would have done for service on a six horse-power gas engine. But the show was pulled off and the coin came. Now, Mr. Richardson, if you have read thus far, or if you have skipped to here, I thank you. As the Japs say, "It is to laugh."

Yes, Friend Wright, it would be "to laugh" if some of the licensed men of to-day were put up against the above. Why, man, they couldn't get away with that combination in a hundred years. You may have seen it but once, but I have seen it lo! these many times. What a bright, shining mark some of the freaks we have operating would make if called upon to play one night stands, take em as they come! Opera house to-night, church to-morrow night, hall next time. Fifty-foot throw to-day, a hundred to-morrow and forty next day; 110 volts to-day, 550 to-morrow, 52 next day. Direct current to-day, alternating to-morrow. A church with No. 14 feed wires, or no wires at all. A—but what's the use? No, Friend Wright, a New York license does most emphatically not evidence competency! It merely is evidence that the department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity deems the holder to have sufficient knowledge to safely be placed in charge of electric current as applied to projection. Nothing more. The license does not evidence in any way, shape, form or manner the holder's ability to put on a good picture. In future it will be a guarantee that at least the operator is old enough to properly be out of school, which it hasn't been in the past. If I had my way about it there would be an examination that would raise a howl loud enough to be heard in Oklahoma, and when the examination was all over there would be about ——— licensed operators left in New York City. I left the number blank because I'm ashamed to print the probable number, judging by what I have seen of the work on New York screens. If New York operators don't like this then let them wake up, get busy and merit commendation instead of the other thing. Don't say its "not your fault." As Neighbor Wright points out, that is but a pitiful excuse, which is no excuse at all. Shake, Neighbor Wright, and shake again! Your description of trouble took me back to old times. It was like the smell of powder to a war-horse.

Light Rays.—One has some queer propositions sprung on one in connection with projection. Naturally one expects to hear words of wisdom from the man in general charge of the American affairs of one of the largest film concerns in the entire world. One certainly expects such an one to be well posted on all matters pertaining to projection. It was therefore something more than a surprise to hear a man in such a position make the assertion that the light rays crossed outside, not inside, the projection lens. That is to say the rays, according to his contention, cross at a distance ahead of the projection lens varying with the focal length of the lens. Not only did he make this claim, but his machine man held the same. Now either this is wrong, absolutely, or the writer knows nothing at all about projection lenses, or rather he will have to un-learn all he has gleaned through years of projection and some study of the subject. Of course the rays do cross in front of the single lens, but the axis of the compound lens—the point called the equivalent focus of the lens—I think, is unquestionably inside and exactly half way between the two component parts of the lens. In considering the action of a projection lens there are many things to take into consideration, such as the fact that the rays of different colors refract at different angles; such as the fact that all rays emanating from a single point must reach a single point. Now if you remove the lens and machine front-plate and illuminate the film in the aperture you will discover the fact that you can see it at any point you may choose to stand in the room—below or above, at one side or the other. This proves that the rays are refracted in every direction by the film itself and it follows that rays from every point of the film reach every point of the lens surface. It, therefore, follows that every ray emanating from a single point of the film must be refracted back by the lens to a single point on the screen, else the picture would necessarily be "out of focus." It follows from all this that rays are crossing in every direction both within the lens and ahead of it. But all the same the main axis of the lens is, I contend, within the lens and half way between its two factors, instead of outside of and ahead of it. If any reader is able to offer anything lucid and understandable on the subject of the law of lenses we shall be only too pleased to hear from him or her, for this lens question certainly is enough to turn one's hair gray.

AN EXAMPLE OF NERVE.

Below is the picture of an intermittent sprocket from a Power's No. 5 machine sent in to that company's factory for repairs. The picture does not show the actual condition of the star, nor does it give but a faint idea of the sprocket teeth, which were worn to mere paper-thin tips, many of them being entirely gone. The star-slots were half the diameter of a cam-pin wider at their base than at the entrance. Truly it formed a sight the like of which the writer would not have believed within the range of possibilities. That a machine could run at all, much less pull a film, with such a wreck of a star and sprocket seems beyond belief. But it evidently did and it must have pulled the film through somehow. Shades of Caesar, what a show it must have been! Imagine the petrified nerve of the man who would charge admission to look at pictures projected by a wreck of that kind! Maybe, too, he employed an operator and had the unlimited gall to expect him to produce results on the screen. Of course I don't mean he employed a real operator, for such an one would not touch a proposition like that with a ten-foot pole. But imagine the impudence of a man asking an employee to put on a show with—that. Really, words fail me, and I'll just ask you to examine the picture and hand the prize idiot of them all a few compliments yourself.

The Genre Transparency Company of Chicago has recently made several additions to their studios. There are now some twenty-four hundred square feet of floor space in this slide factory. A finishing room and office comprises the front of North Clark Street, with a magnificent and spacious studio in the rear. A most complete dark room, replete with novel devices of Mr. Philips' own invention, lies midway between and is now in charge of a competent dark room man, whose excellent training in this line evinces itself in the high grade work that is characteristic of the Genre products. This enterprising concern has thirty thousand slides of every description in stock and are always ready on a moment's notice to fill any order that may be given them. There was recently shipped to South Africa sixty sets of song slides by this company. The color artists employed by Mr. Philips are unsurpassed and their work is the effect of many years of study and training in the art of colors. There are ten of these artists, all of whom are kept busy continually, to place slides on the market that bear the stamp of quality and highly artistic coloring. Mr. Philips' camera department is the most complete of any in existence and in this department the photographs for the several slides for songs and many other special occasions are taken. A staff of high salaried and most competent artists are kept occupied posing for these pictures, so that every minute detail is carried out in this factory for effecting the most perfect song slides that money and labor can produce.

RENO FIGHT SHOWN AT WOMEN'S FETE.

Display of "Moving Pictures" Stirs Clergy of Westport, but Makes Big Hit.

(From the New York "World.")

Westport, Conn., July 22.—"Moving pictures" of the Johnson-Jeffries fight were shown in Westport to-night by women, and they were also shown last night, despite the opposition of clergymen and some of the men members of the churches. This, too, after there had been a tacit understanding among the town officials that the Reno mix-up was to be banned.

The Ladies' Town Improvement Association gave a lawn fete and fair. As an extra attraction it was announced several days ago that the moving pictures of the fight would be shown. The sporting element of the town was jubilant. The women had come to their rescue. The Rev. Charlton B. Strayer denounced the proceedings from his pulpit in the Green Farms Congregational Church. Prominent men withdrew their patronage.

The sporting crowd turned out in full force and the Rev. Mr. Strayer was finally persuaded to come and see the pictures. The "moving pictures" were pictures of the black and white fighters on strings which were pulled by several women to make them move.

Correspondence.

A PROBLEM FOR THE EXHIBITOR.

New York, July 25, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Appreciating the fact that your invaluable publication is principally for the edification and enlightenment of its many readers, and believing the subject to be of vital interest to a large number of managers and others, I take the liberty of suggesting contributions and discussions along the line of ways and means of clearing one's theater of those patrons who may have witnessed the entire program, to the end that those who may be unseated and waiting may be served.

In our own particular case the audience is of an unusually high standard, nearly all of whom are adults. They invariably stay through more than one performance, entailing to the management a large financial loss. No one but a manager of a motion picture house who is in the habit of playing to a full house, without even available standing room—299 seats—and after the day's work finds but a small profit, can understand one's feelings in the matter. In the case in question probably twice as many admissions could be had if room were available—if those who had seen the entire show would vacate!

What is wanted is possibly a system of coupons, or some similar way, so patrons may witness the performance once only; it must be carried out in a congenial manner, so as not to offend, and at the same time not entail too much expense in its enforcement in the way of employees.

Has any one successfully overcome a similar situation? Some claim they have, but it hasn't been proven to my satisfaction.

A. L. T.

Chicago, Ill., July 23, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In the comparatively new business of moving pictures why is it necessary to make the innocent suffer? Aren't there enough ideas to supply the demand without making dumb beasts afford amusement by their suffering and fright. Take the "Mad Dog Scare," of the Selig Company, for instance, and dozens of others in which cats, dogs and chickens play an unwilling part and help teach children to be cruel—just for fun. There is nothing funny in brutality to animals, besides hurting the trade of the moving pictures by showing things of this kind.

Yours truly,

L. W. STEVENS,
5428 Washington avenue.

SWANSON AGREES WITH THE WORLD.

New York, July 23, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—For the first time I have ever annoyed you with a personal comment on your publication, the Moving Picture World, I beg to be pardoned. Appreciating as I do the many calls upon your valuable time, I still could not resist the temptation to express my opinion regarding the article published in your issue of July 30, entitled "Paying the Fiddler" and written by Mr. C. W. Lawford. Passing over his reference to the fight pictures, I refer especially to his able summing up of the picture business, past, present and future. The gentleman seems to me to have said the last word in sizing up the situation. Every idea he has expressed will no doubt be fully understood and appreciated by every man who has been a student of the business, either as a producer renter or exhibitor. The predictions of Mr. Lawford are as inevitable of fulfillment as the rising of the sun if the men in the business do not learn and indelibly impress themselves with the suggestion he sets forth. Through you I desire to express to Mr. Lawford my appreciation for his able efforts to educate those who sadly need enlightenment in the problems that affect the present welfare and the future of the moving picture business. Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM H. SWANSON

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" all next week, July 26, 29 and 30. Tuesday, Friday and Saturday. Every generation and succeeding generation wants to see this celebrated story of the "old South before the war." The time is now ripe for its presentation as dramatized by the Vitagraph Company. To this generation will be accorded one of the greatest privileges of all generations, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in motion pictures. Heretofore "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has been done, but the Vitagraph has done it to the Queen's taste and just right. It is indescribably characteristic of the times in which the story was enacted and will be of historical interest as well as a treat to old and young.

Two things we want to tell you, so you can be prepared to take them on when they come out in early August: "The Game" and "The Wooing O't." Two particularly good pictures, one a strong drama and the other a refined comedy brim full of good business. That's the talk—"Good business!" That's what you want and that's what's in "The Game" and "The Wooing O't."

There is always a novelty about a Scotch story; it has a different coloring and the characters are quaint and natural. "Her Mother's Wedding Gown," displayed for the first time on Saturday, August 6, shows these peculiarities to great advantage. The introduction of "Jean," the acting Scotch collie dog, into the picture is a great attraction and addition, giving an extra touch of real Highland life to this altogether distinctive picture.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

Apron-string bubbies, hearken to the lesson given Jenks, who is one of your kind, and profit by it. Jenks yearned, as you do, to hie himself away from wifey's side for a bit and get some solid enjoyment all by his lonely. Instead he runs into the swiftest bunch of trouble that ever accumulated in one good reel, and it all makes him wish he hadn't made the sudden trek.

The Friday release (August 5) is a gripping heart-drama, by name "The Restoration." It is a curious, a novel thing; in a sense a study in aphasia—one of those weird plots you expect a Thanhouser picture to unfold.

The latest "Thanhouser Classic" is a one-reel dramatization of Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous story of slavery days. With Uncle Tom portrayed by Frank Crane, 'Eliza" by Miss Rosemond, and little Eva by "The Thanhouser Kid," and the photography of the best, the release is easily up to the Thanhouser standard and should be an easy winner.

Necessarily the producers must have found the condensation of so large a book and play into one thousand feet of moving picture film no light task. They have done their work well. Despite the strenuous elimination process applied to the original plot, none of the leading threads have been lost. In fact, the picture stands as a perfect sample of the cutting-down art as practised by present-day film men.

The picture is released on Tuesday, July 26. The story it tells is too well known to require description.

LUBIN NOTES.

The Chinaman is becoming popular as a picture subject. The Lubin production of the Highbinders won very favorable comment from the press and exhibitors, and "Ah Sing and the Greasers," scheduled for release August 4, is another subject with a Celestial star. This time it is a comedy of novelty. There are plenty of laughs in almost every scene and a scream at the finish.

The mother-in-law joke is supposed to be taboo, but "Wifie's Mamma," the Lubin release for July 28, is so very different that it stands in a class by itself. It is one of the snappiest and most delightful little comedies imaginable, and you cannot but laugh at the various developments that swiftly move to a climax as funny as it is novel. Even hardened operators are laughing at this where most comedies get past without a smile, and what the audiences will do is something to anticipate with pleasure.

And talking of comedies: Three orders were received last week for the "Hot Time in Atlantic City" that was issued last August. In two instances the exchange called attention to the fact that this was the third issue of the print of them. It shares favor with "When the Cat's Away," now in its second edition, but there is a story now in hand that will probably beat both of these for humor and novelty, while it possesses considerably more of a story.

"Three Hearts," the Lubin issue for August 1, is an unusually strong story, and was made with particular care. Some of the scenes were made at one of the Philadelphia hospitals, and with the exception of the little group of principals the convalescents enjoying the airing are all actual patients. The taking of the picture was quite an event in the quiet of hospital life and the patients clamored to be permitted to take part in the picture.

EDISON NOTES.

The Edison Company have been adding to their reputation very materially of late by the number and excellence of the feature films they have been producing. Scanning the list of their productions for the past two months, we are impressed by the fact that of the two full reels released by them weekly one film on an average is of feature quality. Magnificent productions, they are, too, each one of such splendid merit in every essential as to preclude the possibility of criticism except, perhaps, in some really unimportant detail which in no wise marred the effect upon the observer.

Their dramatic productions are particularly strong and convincing, and worked out with such infinite care and elaborateness as to make it very evident that time and expense are items not considered by the company. "The Princess and the Peasant," "'Mid the Cannon's Roar," "The Mule Driver and the Garrulous Mute," "A Central American Romance," "The Judgment of the Mighty Deep," "The Stars and Stripes," and "Out of the Night" are examples of the class of films referred to, every one of which is a distinct triumph for the Edison producing forces. There is no question but that these productions have contributed in no small degree to the prestige of the Edison Company.

The Company announce that every release for the first half of September is a feature film. On September 2 will be released "The Man Who Learned," a dramatic subject with an educational and scientific interest, produced in cooperation with the Milk Committee of New York City; on September 5, "The Big Scoop," a dramatic story built around the rush and activity of a metropolitan newspaper office with a threatened bank failure furnishing the story of the "scoop"; September 9, "Alice in Wonderland," an elaborate treat for the "kiddies," and September 13, "Bumptious as a Fireman."

GREAT NORTHERN SECURES A POPULAR COMEDIAN.

Fabian, the celebrated comedian, who has been much sought by the continental film manufacturers, was recently employed by the Great Northern Film Company and is now in their employ, appearing in their comedy productions with the greatest of success. His antics are irresistible, his humor genuine and his facial expressions extremely comical. His debut before the American public will no doubt be appreciated to the fullest extent, as he cannot fail to amuse. To see him is to grin, laugh and roar.

DRAMAGRAPH COMPANY OF AMERICA.

Through an error in correcting proofs of last week's issue the first release of the above company was given in their advertisement as August 4, whereas it should have been August 11. Our readers will note this correction in their advertisement on another page of this issue.

THE CHAMPION INDEPENDENT FILM.

After seeing some of the work that is being turned out by the Champion Film Company, such as "A Romance of an Anvil" and "The Cowboy and the Squaw," we unhesitatingly place them right up to the front among their competitors who have been longer in the field. If hard work and the expenditure of money will make good film the Champion people will get there, and the exhibitor need only see a few of their films to clamor for them regularly.

THE HERMIT OF THE ROCKIES.—No one knows positively whether the old hermit of the mountains has any gold dust or nuggets stowed away in his old tumble-down shack, because he never gives anyone a chance to come nearer than fifty yards. Desiring to fill his bucket at a nearby spring, he peeps from his lofty window that he may be assured that no one lingers near his hut, but to his surprise, standing at his very door are two wandering Indian maidens. He angrily drives them away and after watching them disappear, steals toward the spring. Hastily filling his pail, he starts eagerly for home, but stumbles and falls among the rocks of the stream, breaking his leg. He calls aloud with fear and pain and his wild cries soon bring the Indian girls to his aid. They make a hand basket and carry him to his shack. He keeps one for attendance upon him while the other hurries for the doctor, who lives in the ranchers' settlement on the other side of the mountain. The Indian takes a short cut, but reaches the doctor's house just as his daughter, Jane, is returning from escorting him part way on a hurried call to the valley. The Indian explains her errand and after but a second's hesitation, Jane decides to go herself to do what she can for the old man.

There chances to wander near the hermit's hut a lawless band of ruffians who plan to find out if there is anything of value hidden in the old shack. At the same time a young tenderfoot, prospecting in the district, appears on the scene and fortunately overhears the outlaws' plan. After listening intently for a few seconds, he steals quietly and quickly away. The cutthroats after eating and drinking make for the place of the robbery. They approach the hermit's door and are about to enter boldly, when to their consternation it suddenly opens from within and there, instead of a weak old man, they see the strapping young prospector. They make one attempt to get by him, but in an instant find themselves looking into the barrels of his two quickly drawn guns. Obeying the order "hands up," they forward march away from the place. With a quiet smile the tenderfoot reenters the cabin.

All this while the doctor's daughter is galloping over the mountain. She nears the hut and the young fellow, hearing someone coming and thinking that the robbers have returned, pulls his revolvers with the grim determination to shoot if they cross the threshold. On comes Jane. The door bursts open and the shot rings out as she dashes in to the hermit's aid. Luckily it flies over her head.

Nonplussed, the poor tenderfoot stares and Jane, thinking him an outlaw, bending up the hermit, draws back in fear. He quickly reassures her, however, and tells of the real robbers. He also shows her how he has fixed the old man's leg. With wonder at his bravery and pride in his adroitness the girl grips his proffered hand, and as they look into each other's eyes the seeds of love are planted deep in their hearts. The seeds fully blossom as he accompanies her to her home, and during the long stroll to the settlement the crestfallen broncho dragged on unnoticed.

AN ARCADIAN MAID.—Woe to him who will prey upon those of pastoral and bucolic innocence for fate is sure to wreak vengeance, and that vengeance is invariably terrible. Such was the lot of an unconscionable villain who imposed upon the trusting innocence of the country maid. Priscilla, after a long and weary search, secures work at a farmhouse. She is at once ordered to do the washing, and is just ensconced at the tubs by the well, when a young Italian peddler appears and is directed by her to the mistress. His wares appeal to the farm wife and he succeeds in disposing of quite a bill of goods. Leaving the mistress, the peddler passes on to Priscilla to thank her for bringing him to her mistress and to show his gratitude presents her with a cheap finger-ring, at the same time bestowing upon her words of flattery. The poor innocent little girl is quite overwhelmed and believes every word he utters, treasuring the ring highly, which was not worth more than a nickel. The peddler's principal weakness is gambling, and he not only loses his money, but becomes involved in debt. His creditors press him for payment and he is at a loss as to how to raise the necessary sum, when the thought of the little country maid occurs to him. He knows he has gained her confidence, and that she loves him, hence he considers his plan easy. She, of course, has no money of her own, but she knows her master keeps his money in a sock under his pillow. The peddler persuades her to secure this money pretending that he will take her away with him and marry her. This suggestion fairly hypnotizes her and so she commits the theft. The peddler pockets the money and promises to meet her at their usual trysting-place by the roadside. Here she repairs, only to learn that the scoundrel has just left on the night train. Wildly she dashes towards the railroad only to see the train on its way. Crushed in spirit she wanders off, but the reckoning is inevitable. Fate now takes a hand and on the train the peddler engages in a brawl, during which he tumbles from the flying train. Struggling to his feet he drags himself to the woods. Here the maid meets him, and he in a burst of rage attempts to strike her, but injured more seriously than he realizes, he falls dead at the foot of a tree. With this comes a vivid realization of her deed and, securing the money she had taken from the farmer she hastens to make reparation by putting the money back from where she took it, the master being none the wiser. The affair has taught her a powerful lesson.

HER FATHER'S PRIDE.—Of all human actions, pride seldom obtains its end; for, aiming at honor and reputation, it reaps contempt and derision. It was the sin that overthrew the angels. It proceeds from the want of sense or the want of thought. The old father in this Biograph story was possessed of such unreasonable pride as to cause much misery and heartache. We cannot consistently call it pride, but rather, narrow prejudice. Mr. and Mrs. Southcomb dearly loved their only daughter Ann, but, being Quakers, had set ideas. Ann was a pretty girl of twenty, bright, vivacious and romantic, and loved her parents devotedly, but she chafed under what she deemed almost parental despotism. They decried any ebullition her youth might induce, and frowned into silence her joyous ringing laughter. This condition told on her and she longed for life's radiant sunshine, love. It comes at last. Allen Edwards, a concert singer, while driving his auto in the neighborhood of the old Quaker's farm, meets with a serious accident, and is carried to the Southcomb homestead. He is in such a condition that he cannot be removed to his home for some time, and hence is cared for by the Southcomb family, although the old man openly expresses his aversion for the young man on account of the profession. An attachment springs up between Ann and Allen which ripens into sincere love. The old man is beside himself with rage when they broach the subject of marriage. But Ann is decided and the old man, though he loves his daughter, haughtily drives her from the house, for when pride begins love ceases. He stubbornly refuses to have anything further to do with her. He becomes so bitter that he erases her name from the family Bible. To him she is as dead. Many a heartache does the young wife suffer, though Allen has tried time and time again to effect a reconciliation, until one day they receive word that the old Southcomb farm had been seized for debt and the couple were forced to go to the poorhouse. What a shock this is to the young couple! It is the old story of pride defeating its own end by bringing the man who seeks esteem into contempt. The young people make their way to the poorhouse, where the old father is seen scrubbing floors, while the mother bends over a washtub. They are brought to the office to interview their disowned daughter, but the old man is still adamant, and while the mother is inclined to accept Ann's protection the father stubbornly refuses, going back with hauteur to his scrub pail. Ann now realizes that something more than bare persuasion must be resorted to, and as she views through the half open door her parents' sad plight, an idea strikes her. Seating herself at the organ, she plays and sings her father's favorite hymn. The sound of the music halts the old man in his work, and he crawls sobbing to the door to hear the better. Ann continues to play and sing until at last he staggers up to be folded in her arms. He now realizes how unreasonable he has been, not only to her, but to her mother and himself.

AN UNEXPECTED REWARD.—"The Unexpected Reward," which happened one day in spring when a fair pink and white miss had reached the alluring age of sweet eighteen. Upon her birthday her father presents her with a beautifully carved bracelet. Scarcely have the blushes of pride died away when a dapper young suitor for her hand arrives with an invitation for an auto ride to the seaside. Soon the gay party arrives at the beach. An hour has scarcely passed before the young miss and her girl friend are disporting themselves in the water.

Suddenly the father hears a cry of alarm! Yonder, far out at sea, his daughter is waving signals of distress and is being swept farther and farther seaward by a heavy undertow. At once the fond parents turn for help to the girl's suitor, but he fails to be equal to the occasion. Fearing for his own safety he refuses to go. A stranger hears the appeal for aid and, seeing the dangerous position of the girl, in a moment strips off hat and coat and dives head first into the water from the pier. The long, steady strokes of the swimmer soon prove to the frantic mother and father that he will reach the girl in time. The surf is stronger than they reckoned, however, and before the swimmer can reach her side she gives up from sheer exhaustion and sinks beneath the waves. A moment of despair and then the watchers on the shore see the rescuer dive under the water and bring forth the limp body to the surface. After a hard swim back to shore willing hands drag them both to safety.

An hour later the girl has revived and the party is returning home when the daughter discovers that she has lost her bracelet. This fact comes to the ears of her brave rescuer, and he decides to recover the lost article if possible. He succeeds in doing so, too, after numerous dives around the spot where she sank and where the bracelet had fallen from her wrist in her struggle for life. Needless to say the bracelet is returned to the fair owner, greatly to the chagrin and anger of her cowardly suitor, who quickly sees that the hero of the seaside is fast holding full sway in the thoughts and mind of this fair miss of eighteen.

The cowardly gallant decides to humiliate his proud rival before the eyes of the girl at the earliest opportunity, which chances to be the following day. While out driving with the young lady they chance to meet the finder of the bracelet, and, driving up to the curb, the dainty miss insists on again thanking her rescuer. The jealous suitor succeeds in humiliating his rival so that hot words are exchanged, and in a fit of rage at the fond admiration for the manly young fellow which the girl so plainly shows the coward raises his whip to strike. The next moment it is wrench from him by fair hands, and sweet young lips, hot with anger, politely inform him that he may drive on alone, which he does in a towering rage. Her hands are placed in that of her hero—a quick glance of love, and he knows that all is well for him.

A few days later little Dan Cupid inveigles the two into a visit to a shady nook in the garden by the fountain; and what the fishes saw they never told, but the bees among the flowers heard the faintest sound of a kiss and only buzzed the louder to drown the sound of others that they knew would follow.

BUMPTIOUS AS AN AVIATOR.—Our amusing little friend Bumptious again makes his appearance, and shows his versatility by entering the field of aeronautics. Needless to say he starts in with his usual unlimited confidence, and in the course of the picture again illustrates humorously the adage that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." This time it is not a matter of expense which starts him on the road to a conquest of the air, but the seeing of the successful flight of one of the world's famous aviators. The expression of wonder and amusement from his wife and others of the town folk naturally jar upon his sensitive nature, and he assures them that the whole thing is very simple and that he could probably do better if he tried.

He does try, and succeeds in building a most simple and artistic looking aeroplane of his own, which after a private view by his particular friends is taken to a roof top and poised for flight. Of course a large crowd gathers, and after a brief dissertation on the beauties of his own machine little Bumptious takes his seat and starts the machinery. To his delight the aeroplane flies over the edge of the house and sails off into the ambient atmosphere. What he does not know is that far above him in the blue sky floats a big balloon, from which dangles a rope with an anchor at the end of it, and that this anchor is caught in the top of his aeroplane and had gently but firmly assisted in its launching. His friends take in the situation and it causes them great joy. We see successive views of the aeroplane dangling from the balloon and the perturbation of the two balloonists above, and finally of little Bumptious dangling from the front of the aeroplane in midair in a vain attempt to reach the ground, hundreds of feet below him. His motor spins the propeller around aimlessly in the air above him and the next thing we see is a sudden descent. He lands in a heap in a grassy place. Fragments of the ruined aeroplane strewing themselves over him in wild disorder and this is followed by the alighting of the two balloonists close by, who no sooner strike terra firma than they proceed to wreak revenge upon the cause of their trouble, who is struggling to free himself from the debris. Their anger is so great that while they are engaged in pummeling our somewhat stout friend Bumptious they fail to note that their balloon has sailed away and left them, but they take it out of him finally and with such a thoroughness as to give him ample cause for the discouragement which is apparent when we see him limping home through the sunset, down and along a stretch of country road.

MULCAHY'S RAID. The sergeant is seen patrolling his beat one fine Spring morning, when a young chap cautiously approaches him and slips a note into his hand. The note contains the information that there is a cock fight in progress in the rear of a neighboring buffet. Mulcahy turns about to question the lad, but the young fellow has made good his escape and Mulcahy decides to go to the buffet and reconnoitre.

Next we are shown a company of moving picture actors, camera man and producer. A number of the actors are dressed as policemen and after watching them photograph an amusing scene, we next see Mulcahy at the rear of the saloon. He finds a knothole through a fence which gives him an opportunity to see what is going on behind. On the other side is a little group of men, drinking and betting, while they await the arrival of the birds.

Quickly planning a method of capturing the gamblers, Mulcahy hurries up the alley, when he runs into the artificial policemen employed by the moving picture concern. Mulcahy is frustrated and mistaking them for real officers, informs them of the cock fight and tells them he must have their assistance. The actors consider it a joke and volunteer to assist Mulcahy in rounding up the gamblers.

We next are shown the cock pit. The two birds are released and a hot fight is in progress when Mulcahy and his squad leap over the fence and begin laying about with their clubs. The mob of gamblers is cowed and corraled and Mulcahy leads the way to the police station.

At the station the gamblers are hustled in by Mulcahy, who is not aware that he has been deserted by his actor-policemen, who have been called back to duty by their irate producer.

Inside, Mulcahy tells the sergeant the story of the capture and is then questioned by the desk sergeant if he effected the round-up single-handed. The patrol sergeant looks about, and seeing that he is alone, he answers: "Sure, I did it meself." Whereat the desk sergeant congratulates him and pins on his pride-swelled chest the leather medal of the League of the Brave and Fearless.

A COLLEGE CHICKEN.—We are first shown a dusky gentleman invading a chicken coop, from whence he issues bearing a fine, fat pullet. As he slinks up the street he runs into a bunch of college boys out on the usual campaign of devilry. The suspicious actions of the colored man and the wriggling contents of the bag he carries excite the boys' curiosity and when it is found that the bag contains a chicken, it is removed from the colored gentleman's person, while he is told to make tracks in the opposite direction.

In their room the boys execute the chicken and prepare for a feast, despite the fact that there is a card tacked on their walls from some college dignitary warning them of immediate expulsion if they are caught cooking food in their room. However, the boys unanimously agree that chicken is something other than food, so they prepare for the feast.

During the execution of the chicken and the rendering of it into enough parts to go around the boys bring out a chafing dish, and other table accessories, when they are interrupted by the sound of footsteps in the hall outside. There is a wild scramble as the boys endeavor to hide all evidence of the feast, and when Prof. Pettibone enters he finds his young men studying faithfully, the only evidence of the feast being one or two chicken feathers which the boys failed to hide.

The professor goes out and a moment later the chicken is brought forth and preparations continue. Finally it is cooked and ready to serve when the professor is again heard coming up the hall. Seizing a waste basket, the boys stow the cooked chicken in the basket and lowed it out the window. When the professor returns he finds the boys again busily occupied with their tasks, but this time he stays longer, as he is perfectly sure that that delicious aroma of fried chicken must be real.

In the meantime the waste basket containing the chafing dish and chicken has been discovered by the girls occupying the room below, and, believing this to be a present from the boys, they remove the dish and are soon busily employed. When the last atom of meat is stripped from the bones of the chicken they restore the bones to the chafing dish, write a note of thanks to the boys, and put the dish back into the waste basket.

In the room above the professor, who is unable to find any evidence of the supposed rule breaking, bids the boys good-night. There is a rush for the window, the basket is raised and the clothing dish placed on the table, when, to their horror, they find nothing left but the bones.

UNDER WESTERN SKIES. Kate Allison, an exceptionally beautiful Western girl, is engaged to marry a young Easterner, a long time family friend. In the first scene the fiancee is bidding his sweetheart good bye and he is to be accompanied to the station by his prospective father in law.

The girl is left alone with a warning that should she be molested by any of the crowd of drunken cowpunchers who would be returning from a dance at a neighboring ranch, not to hesitate to shoot.

We are next shown three young punchers, all intoxicated, riding up to the door of the cottage. All dismount, and one, peering into the window, sees the girl alone. Recklingly they enter to find the girl covering them with a Winchester, but the foremost of the gang strides forward and before she can pull the trigger jerks the gun from her hands.

The punchers resolve to play a game of poker to see who will win the young lady. A greasy pack is brought forth and the game starts. The girl sees the desperateness of the situation and resolves to employ desperate means in protecting herself. A card falls on the floor from the hand of the puncher nearest her, and seizing it she scribbles a line across the face and slips it into the puncher's hands. It reads: "I will be yours in marriage if you will protect me from the others."

The puncher reads the note, covertly watching the others, then as he looks at the girl a new sensation sweeps over his soul and he nods his head. He starts an altercation, accusing one of the others of cheating, which ends in all the punchers leaving the room to settle the dispute at twenty paces, in the old-fashioned and gentlemanly way.

When the puncher returns to the girl he is alone. He tells her she must now make good her promise and swears faithfully to make himself worthy of her. She nods her head, but it is a look of hatred and scorn which she fastens on him as they leave.

They are married and go to the cowpuncher's quarters. He apologizes for his poverty but repeats his promise to make her happy if she will give him a chance. Yet she steadfastly refuses to allow him to make love to her.

A few months drag by and the former fiance of the girl traces her to her new home. He demands an explanation and asks her if she loves her husband. She answers angrily that she does not and then eagerly accepts his invitation to return East with him.

Without horses or other conveyances it is almost impossible for them to cross the strip of desert which separates them from her father's home, but they resolve to attempt the journey. On the way they become lost, and the last drop of the canteen, which her fiance had selfishly drained himself, finds them in desperate straits and facing the most cruel of all deaths. The girl stumbles and begs for his assistance, but the panic-stricken young fellow refuses. They stumble upon the bones of a horse and the shock of this sight is the last straw on the camel's back and the girl totters to the ground in a faint. The young fellow offers no assistance, but staggers desperately on.

An hour later, dazed and blindly tottering, he falls into the arms of a young prospector, who, after giving the young man restoratives, learns of the woman lost on the trail. The young prospector hurries back on the path indicated by the young fellow and an hour later staggers back into camp with the young girl in his arms.

She has regained her senses and recognizes in the prospector her deserted husband. The cowardly young fiance then asks the girl to do on with him, but she refuses and clings to her husband, whom she has vowed to love and obey forever after.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

AN ANCIENT MARINER.—This is an amusing picture of which the hero is a retired admiral, who follows on land the same routine that he practised at sea. Thus in the morning his faithful servant runs up a flag over his bedstead and fires a small cannon to awaken him. One of the admiral's weaknesses is to give all his orders through a speaking trumpet, and this very much annoys everyone he has to do with. He cannot rest except in a hammock, and so when he goes to an inn one is slung up for him while he is partaking of refreshment.

THE ACE OF HEARTS.—A captain is the proud possessor of a pretty daughter, who in turn possesses the affections of a certain young man. One morning the captain marches off for his daily recreation during the course of which he visits a near by cafe and commences a game of cards with a friend. At a later stage of the game the captain accuses his opponent of cheating. Cards are exchanged. At this juncture the daughter's suitor saunters in, sums up the position, and runs off to tell the daughter. Returning, he is prevailed upon by the girl to patch up the difference between the two old men, and the film ends with concord reigning supreme.

TENERIFFE, the GEM OF THE CANARIES.—This is the largest of the Canary group, measuring about sixty miles in length by half as many in width. The bulk of the island is composed of mountains of volcanic origin. Only about one-seventh of the island's area is under cultivation. In ordinary years sufficient grain and potatoes are produced to supply the wants of the island. Numerous fruits and berries are also grown. Our panorama covers all the points of exceptional interest and gives a perfectly clear conception of the appearance of both the cities and the wilder portions of the beautiful island.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

WITCH OF CARABOSSE.—Our story follows closely an old French legend of a witch who lived in a heap of ruins near a medieval village. She was much feared by the young people of the community, with one exception, a pompous young swain who takes great delight in leading the others against the mysterious woman. He finally falls victim to her conjurings, much to the pleasure of most of his companions, as his foolhardiness had always been a matter of considerable envy. After many unpleasant experiences he is released from the spell a wiser man.

CAMEL AND HORSE RACING IN EGYPT.—The racing is not restricted to horses, however; ungainly camels also compete. An interesting part of the picture shows horses gracefully dancing to the strains of a band. The scenes are presented in the following order: I. The Paddock—Showing the numerous entries and the society of that tropical country. The fierce brightness of the sun has made possible remarkably clear-cut pictures. II. Horse Races—In which the contesting animals are all graceful Arabian steeds; beautiful of body, sleek of limb and small of hoof. They are ridden by native jockeys; and III. Camel Races—The "Ships of the Desert" swing along at remarkable speed. It is interesting to note the ease with which they seem to move in these races as compared with their clumsiness in ordinary action. IV. Dancing Horses —This final scene is probably the most interesting and certainly the most beautiful. The finely bred Arabian steeds ridden by chiefs of the sand kingdom entertain in a fascinating manner.

A COLONIAL BELLE.—This is a dramatization of a real episode of the Revolutionary War. No attempt has been made to deviate in the slightest from the original pretty story which is immortalized in many of the early school readers. Captain Roger Bacon, an officer in the continental Army, is in love with Betty Wadsworth, a true patriot. The campaign has centered around the section in which the Wadsworth mansion is located and a party of gay young Hessian officers take possession of the fine old house and make it their headquarters. Captain Bacon in the meantime has been corresponding with Betty, and when she puts up a plan to outwit and overcome the Hessians he readily falls in with it. Betty organizes a little party in honor of the Hessian officers, and after a cotillion an old-fashioned game of forfeits is proposed. In this game the Hessian officers are induced to surrender their side arms, to be won back during the progress of the game. As soon as the Hessians are disarmed, however, a signal is given to the waiting patriots outside; doors and windows are flung open and Captain Bacon with his men burst in and take the hapless Hessians captive.

Every scene in this production is vouched for by the Kalem Company as a true picture of stirring times in New England during the period of the Revolutionary War, and as such the film is of the highest educational value.

It will be noted that the gowns worn by the women of the Kalem Stock Company in this production are originals in possession of the owners of the mansion about which the picture was made. The cast of characters includes Miss Gauntier, Mr. Vincent, Mr Mitchell, Mr. Vosburg, Mr. Vignolia and Mr. Melford, all Kalem favorites, and one of the strongest and best balanced ever put together by the Kalem producers.

THE LEGEND OF SCAR FACE is a story that is always told to the Indian boy when the father desires to rouse his ambition and to enthuse him with a daring to do great deeds. Scar Face, as the legend goes, when a baby was clawed and torn by a bear, so that when he grew up he was so badly crippled as to be almost utterly unfitted for the strenuous games and cruel warfare of his tribesmen. The old men of the tribe, however, had for years handed down a story that some day one of the tribe would be developed into a warrior much greater and braver than any who had preceded him, and hearing this story the daughter of the Chief decides that she will be the squaw of this famous warrior, and of none other, and in a vision the face of the great warrior is revealed to her and to other members of the tribe. It is that of Scar Face except that it has none of the scars nor deformities. The bucks of the tribe in derision tell Scar Face that he must indeed be the great warrior and suggest that he go forth to win fame and renown for himself. Scar Face takes their jibe seriously and does venture forth. His adventures are shown in the picture and it is useless to say that they are of the most thrilling character, and when Scar Face has achieved all the necessary coups a vision of the mighty Manitou appears to him and he is told that if he will bathe in the waters of a certain mystic spring all of his deformities and scars will vanish. Scar Face does as he is told and is transformed into a noble and prepossessing warrior. His fame has gone before him and when he returns to his tribe he is acclaimed as the great war chief of the legend and the Chief's daughter becomes his bride.

MRS. BARGAINDAY'S BABY. Mrs. Bargainday reads of a bargain day sale, takes her baby and starts for the sale to avoid the rush. Arriving at the store she meets at the door Mr. Jones and requests him to hold her baby for her while she goes inside to do some shopping. He consents, supposing she will only be a few minutes, and while standing there with the baby in his arms several of his lady friends, attracted by the bargain sale, pass him by with surprise, and others entirely ignore him or smile with amusement. Poor Jones is in a pickle.

Mrs. Bargainday is fighting her way to the bargain counter and gets so in the spirit of the thing that she forgets, for the time being, all about Jones and her child. Jones is on the verge of collapse when Smith comes along with his baby in a perambulator and, while he steps up to the store window to see the display of goods, Jones puts Mrs. Bargainday's baby in the carriage with Smith's youngster and then "beats it" for his office.

Smith starts off with his perambulator entirely ignorant of his extra charge, stops at a saloon, slips in and meets several of his friends who all insist in treating Smith in turn. Smith comes out of the saloon and discovers Mrs. Bargainday's baby, thinks he sees double or else has overindulged. Satisfying himself that there are two kids instead of one, he goes on his way until he reaches a very inviting door-step, places Mrs. Bargainday's baby on it, rings the door-bell and makes himself scarce.

The occupant of the house, Mrs. Greene, hears the bell, goes to the front door and discovers the baby, takes it to her room and tries to make it comfortable. Her husband, who soon comes home, sees the baby and will not listen to his wife's explanation and insists upon getting rid of it. She goes out on the street to look for the child's parents and meets a classy young man and his sweetheart, rushes up to them and thrusts the "kidlet" into the young man's arms and makes a "get away" before the young man can realize what it all means. To add to his predicament his girl thinks there is something suspicious about the whole matter and he certainly feels uncomfortable.

While all this is going on Mrs. Bargainday has come out of the store with her purchases, looks for Jones and the baby, learns the direction Jones has taken and starts in pursuit until she comes up with him. He tells her he gave the child to Smith and then, with Jones, starts after Smith. They are informed Smith was seen in the saloon, where they are told the course he has taken; and again, with others joining in the chase, they take up the trail and reach Greene's house, where the little one was left by Smith, and are informed by Mrs. Greene that she gave it to a young fellow down the street. Eagerly the race begins again until they reach the young man who is foolishly holding the baby. He gladly returns it to its mother who, overjoyed, clasps it to her bosom exclaiming, "My child, my child," greatly to the relief of all hands who have been drawn into the general mixup with Mrs. Bargainday's baby.

PATHE FRERES

GETTING EVEN WITH THE LAWYER.—Herbert Brief is a successful and respectable lawyer. He has fallen in love with Norah, the daughter of parents who look upon him as a model of all the virtues. Norah, however, against the wishes of her parents has a great liking for Fred. Dauber, a penniless artist. Dauber has a lady friend, who, like himself, is a student of art. To her he confides his troubles and begs her to help him. She agrees, and a note is dispatched by her to the barrister. In it she professes her admiration for his eloquence and makes an appointment to meet him after he comes from court. Herbert meets her and is persuaded into going to her studio, where he is lured into posing as a model in fancy dress. Other students come in, and when the fun is at its highest Norah and her parents enter. Bitter is the disillusion of the latter as they gaze upon their prospective son-in-law and his company, and Dauber, seizing his opportunity, obtains the consent of Norah's parents to his marriage to their daughter.

BREAKING UP ICE IN FINLAND.—The port of Helsingfors is in the grip of ice and frost, and a wide expanse of frozen water meets the eye with vessels held fast in the ice. Great icebreaking vessels swing slowly out of the port, plough through the frozen field and masses of splintered ice fly on either side of the thin furrow of water left in the wake of their stern.

DETECTIVES' DREAM.—Padlock Soames, the famous detective, worried by his non-success in the capture of Slippery, the notorious thief, falls asleep and dreams that a defiant challenge by the criminal to catch him meets his eye in the columns of a newspaper. In his dream the detective believes himself to be possessed of a magic mirror on the surface of which is reflected every action of the thief; that he accepts the challenge with equanimity, and that by means of this valuable glass he is enabled to battle Slippery in every ruse which he adopts.

Physically, however, Padlock finds he is not a match for the agile thief, and although he engages in several struggles with him, one of which takes place on the surface of a broad sheet of water, he is in every case disgusted to find himself suddenly grasping nothing more material than air, or some portion of clothing left in his hands by the wily thief. Exasperated, he loses his calmness, allows an angry ejaculation to break from his lips, and awakens with a start to find out the whole affair is a dream.

CAGLIOSTRO.—The picture opens with Cagliostro in the laboratory of the alchemist, Athletas, his instructor in magic. The latter predicts to his pupil that his fate is interwoven with that of a gypsy girl, Lorenza. Cagliostro first meets her in a cafe, where he picks a quarrel with the Chevalier D'Oisement, who is conversing with her and wounds him in the duel that ensues. Lorenza tries to intervene between the duellists, but Cagliostro by mesmeric influence forces her to be still, and after carries her to his home, where seeing that she is an excellent hypnotic subject he compels her to act as a medium. Lorenza predicts the French revolution and the death of Marie Antoinette. Cagliostro aided by Lorenza gains celebrity and repute, and is commanded to give an exhibition of his magic before the King, Louis XVI., and his Queen, Marie Antoinette. The latter, delighted with the strange wonderful things, requests to be allowed to read her own future in the crystal. Cagliostro refuses, but is compelled to obey the Queen's commands, and raising the glass to her eyes she reads in it the story of her doom. The King, wild with anger, orders him to be seized, and at the same moment the chief of the police appears to denounce him. The Chevalier D'Oisement had not forgotten Cagliostro, and after obtaining proof of his magical practices had finally accused him to the chief of the police as a sorcerer. In his cell Cagliostro is haunted by visions of the marriage of Lorenzo to the Chevalier, and this remarkable man, who really loved the gypsy girl passionately, seeks relief in death by means of a poison ring rather than wait for the judicial sentence of death, which in that prejudicial period he felt sure would be his fate. The character of Lorenza is portrayed admirably by Mlle. Napierkowska, the graceful dancer of the Paris Opera House, whose previous appearance in filmdom was as the messenger in Cleopatra.

DAVY JONES AND CAPTAIN BRAGG.—Davy Jones, the irrepressible, has his weather eye trained upon the attractive "Widow Cute," whom he makes up his mind to win by fair or foul means. Returning from a day's fishing, he passes her cottage, in the garden of which she is comfortably seated enjoying the fresh air and the aromatic perfume of the flowers. Davy drops his wheelbarrow and sidles up to her with bashful and embarrassed advances, trying to lead her into conversation and up to the subject of matrimony, the one idea with which he is saturated. While he is trying to force this issue, Captain Bragg, in officer's uniform, brass buttons, etc., hauls in sight and completely eradicates "Davy" and his intentions.

"Davy" recognizes the irresistible charms of Bragg and at once hastens to his room to titivate himself in his "glad rags" and get on the job, fortifying himself with a "Solitary" engagement ring of pure crystal, feeling that to be forewarned and forearmed is half the battle when it comes to the battle of hearts. With the assistance of his friend and room mate with a face like a fish, "Davy" prepares for the fray and, after many struggles and wriggles, starts out to clinch the widow.

Again he is doomed to disappointment, and again overthrown by the gay and bewhiskered Captain Bragg. Desperate, despondent and determined, "Davy" fastens an immense anchor about his neck and proceeds to suicide, but even in this he is baffled, saved by his salty old chum, who tells him while there is life there is hope, at the same time agrees to pilot him into smooth and pleasant waters. He hikes it back to his room, wraps himself in a sheet and pillow case, lays in wait for the approaching Bragg, who with the widow is taking a stroll in the wood and the moonlight. While the ghost is waiting, "Davy" stands nearby hidden from view.

Spooning and lost in sweet nothings, the unsuspecting couple is looking into the depths of each other's eyes when the ghost looms up. The widow collapses and cries for help, while the brave and dauntless Bragg takes it to the woods and "Davy" comes to the widow's assistance and protection. She falls into his arms, graciously thanks her kind and fearless deliverer and showers her smiles and blessings upon him. "Davy" is a winner and does not fail to make the best of his victory and press the prize to his bosom.

In his anxiety to congratulate "Davy," the old scarecrow of a "ghost" comes forward with bows and smirks, the sheet trailing behind him, hanging out of his sweater where he has stuffed it to keep it out of sight. The comedy of the situation is a whole show in itself and makes a strong finish.

HAKO'S SACRIFICE.—Poor Hako, a Japanese boy, is sold into bondage to a cruel fisherman who makes his life a burden and even more wretched than his physical deformities and weakness. Morning Glory, a little Japanese girl, in passing the fisherman's hut with her mother, sees Hako, looks into the sad face and feels sorry for him. Her father is a florist, and when he gives his daughter a couple of chrysanthemum plants, she gives one of them to Hako, who stealthily plants it where it cannot be seen by his cruel master, at night watering and cultivating it as the only bright thing in his unhappy life, and his sole possession.

Morning Glory's father fails in business and is put in jail for debt, to the great delight of Keiki, his enemy and competitor in business. The Prince of the province offers a reward of five hundred yen to the child who brings the finest specimen of chrysanthemum on Festival Day. Hako is delighted, and hopes to win the prize and his freedom at the same time.

Morning Glory rejoices in the thought that she will win the prize and her father's release from prison. Keiki, in passing Morning Glory's garden, sees her watching her cherished plant and its remarkable flower. He waits until nightfall, and, stealing into the garden, destroys the precious plant. The little girl, on discovering her loss, is inconsolable. Hako happens to be passing her house at this moment and resolves to sacrifice his chrysanthemum to the child's purpose, for he loves the girl who has always been so kind and good to him.

At night Hako removes his plant and transplants it in Morning Glory's garden in place of the one she lost. The child goes into the garden the next morning. Her joy is unbounded. She thinks the gods have answered her prayer. The Festival Day arrives and Morning Glory wins the prize; her father is released from prison and Hako's sacrifice has won the great happiness and joy which is only the compensation gained by those who make it.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.—The incidents of this story are some of those preceding and leading up to the civil war in 1861 and the Declaration of Emancipation.

The central figure in the drama is Uncle Tom, a slave in the possession of the Shelbys of Kentucky. Tom is a peculiarly extraordinary character, possessing all the virtues and none of the bad qualities of his race, a possession brought about by a gradual realization, absorption and practice of Christian principles through a close study of the Bible.

To the Shelbys he is an invaluable asset, because of his honesty and trustworthiness. Mr. Shelby, although owner of vast estates, has become greatly involved in debt, as is often the case with aristocracy. His notes have come into the hands of a slave trader named Haley, who presses Shelby for money long over due. While visiting Shelby on one of his periodic "duns," he agrees to purchase "Uncle Tom" and Harry, a child of a quadroon, Eliza, Mrs. Shelby's maid.

It is a hard bargain, but necessity, which is apt to drive to extremes, succumbs and the deal is made. Eliza overbears the transaction, and, loving her child with all her heart, decides to flee with him to the Ohio side of the river. She escapes from the house during the night, goes to "Uncle Tom's" cabin and tells him and his wife, "Aunt Chloe," all about her trouble, and also that Tom has been sold to the slave dealer, and advises him to get away while there is yet time. Tom, feeling it his bounden duty to live up to the tenets of his sale as well as his own conscience, refuses, but blesses Eliza and wishes her Godspeed.

When Haley discovers the flight of Eliza he is frantic, and, calling into service some of Shelby's slaves and the ever-ready bloodhounds, he starts in pursuit of his prey. Eliza has made her way with her dear Harry clasped to her bosom to the banks of the Ohio river in a driving snowstorm, with the piercing cold winds carrying the baying of the bloodhounds to her ears as they follow mercilessly in her tracks. The ferryboats are not running, and the boatmen who usually ply their traffic across the river are afraid to encounter the fierce storm and the ice floes at the risk of their produce and their own lives.

Spurred on by mother love and courage born of liberty and protection of the helpless, Eliza unhesitatingly jumps down the river's bank onto a large cake of floating ice, which rafts her down the stream, then from one piece of ice to another she leaps like a deer until she reaches the Ohio side of the river, where she is assisted up the bank and seeks shelter for herself and child.

Haley and his negro aides are baffled in the capture of their quarry. Haley is furious; the negroes delighted, and while Haley goes to the tavern to appease his wrath the darkies show their pleasure in fits of laughter, and return to the Shelby place to report Eliza's escape. Haley, after a night of it in company with Marks, the lawyer, and Tom Rorer, a human bloodhound, goes back to take possession of "Uncle Tom," by the sale of whom he hopes to make up the loss of Harry.

Uncle Tom, after a last farewell to his wife and little pickaninnies, and a hearty good-bye from young "Mars" George Shelby, who promises he will purchase "Tom" himself some day, gets into Haley's wagon, shackled hand and foot, with a sad heart but Christian resignation, bids farewell forever to his old Kentucky home.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN—Part II.—Haley, with Uncle Tom and his other slaves, boards the steamboat and starts down the Mississippi for Louisiana. On the boat going home from a visit to Vermont is Mr. Augustine St. Clare with his little daughter, Eva, a beautiful child of delicate temperament, and a maiden aunt named "Miss Ophelia." On the way down the river poor Tom makes himself helpful and cheerfully obliging to everybody, lending a hand with the freight and saying a kind and courteous word whenever spoken to.

Whenever he can find time he reads in his laboring way his Bible, which is a source of great comfort to him. Eva is especially attracted to Tom. He has his pocket stored with odd toys of his own manufacture, which furnishes her great amusement during the long and tedious progress of the boat. One day Eva falls overboard. Uncle Tom with unhesitating courage jumps into the river and brings her safely back to the boat.

This cements her attachment for Tom. She begs her father to buy him for her own. The father, always ready to satisfy her every wish, makes a deal with Haley, and Tom is purchased for Eva, who makes him her companion and attendant. "Miss Ophelia," although a Northerner, is shocked at the readiness with which Eva associates and confides in Tom, but as she learns afterward it is not misplaced and well deserved.

The St. Clares arrive at their home in New Orleans. Tom is initiated as a member of the household, and while officially the coachman he is personally the bodyguard of Eva and he is her constant "fides achates." We can see the sensitive nature and constitution of the child gradually succumb to the climatic changes and the rackings of the severe cough and cold which has settled upon her lungs. Her father decides to move the family and household to his country home, where he hopes Eva will improve and get well.

It is here we are introduced to "Topsy," a coal black little negress whom St. Clare buys for "Miss Ophelia" to call her own and bring up in the way she would have her go. From this time on to the close of the film "Topsy" is a noticeable and amusing person.

For two years Uncle Tom's life with the St. Clares is an uninterrupted dream, excepting the thoughts of his separation from his dear old wife and his children. After two years little Eva's illness becomes so bad she appears to be undergoing a process of translation and looks more like a vision of immortality in the midst of mortal things. Often she talks with Uncle Tom about Heaven with an understanding that makes Tom think, and everybody else for that matter, that she is not long for this world. These suppositions are well founded, for it is not long before Eva is seen on her bed surrounded by her parents, Aunt Ophelia, Uncle Tom and the servants of the family. She bids each one good-bye, giving each some little keepsake, then peacefully passes away to join the other angels in Heaven.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN—Part III.—The sorrow following the death of little Eva has scarcely passed when the house of St. Clare is again thrown into mourning by the death of Mr. St. Clare, who was stabbed while trying to stop a quarrel between two men. Mr. St. Clare had promised Uncle Tom his freedom, in anticipation of which he is inspired with new hope and great ambition to work for the liberation of his wife and children, but all this is doomed by his master's untimely end, and all the servants of the St. Clare place are sold to speculators and other masters.

Tom is sold to Legree, who is brutal in the extreme, and treats poor Tom with little less consideration than a dog. Legree has established as his mistress Cassie, a quadroon slave, whom he treats as badly as he dares, for she has a strong influence over him and despises him with a heartiness that she cannot hide. One day, working in the cotton field, Cassie meets Uncle Tom, and is impressed by his generosity and gentleness of spirit and his all-abiding faith in God.

At the same time Legree bought Tom he bid in a young mulatto girl named Emmeline, whom he also introduced into his household to displace Cassie, whom he tries to relegate again to the cotton picking rank of slaves. Emmeline likes Cassie, abhors Legree, and keeps as far from him as possible. Tom is subjected to every sort of indignation and uncomplainingly does his duty. It is not until he is asked to flog a poor slave girl that he refuses to obey his master, and is himself unmercifully whipped by Legree and two of his slaves.

Cassie finds life with Legree unbearable, and hates him with an indescribable intensity. She plans to accomplish escape for herself and Emmeline, and asks Uncle Tom to go with them, but he refuses to leave while others suffer for no more reason than himself. Cassie plays upon Legree's superstition and fear, for, in reality, he is an arrant coward, and she makes him believe there are ghosts in the garret of his house, and when she and Emmeline take flight and he pursues them with bloodhounds and slaves, the women retrace their steps, after passing through the swamp to throw the dogs off the trail, and return to the garret, where they remain for three days and make good their escape when favorable opportunity presents itself after Legree has given them up as gone.

Legree, filled with rage, for want of better excuse accuses Uncle Tom of knowing something about Cassie's escape and being party to it. Tom denies that he had any hand in it, and refuses to reveal his knowledge of it. Legree vents his spite and cussedness by administering a severe beating to Tom and felling him with a savage blow.

Young Shelby, who promised Tom at the time his father sold him to Haley that he would repurchase him as soon as he could, now comes to Legree's place to buy him back. Too late! Poor Tom has gone to his eternal freedom to dwell with his Master, who makes no distinction in color, creed or class and prepareth a place for all those who love Him and keep His Commandments, and of whom Tom was a faithful disciple.

ATLAS.

THE REST CURE.—Peace-loving John Quiet had lived long and satisfactorily to himself. Instigated by a doctor's prescription, an indulgent sister's solitude and a brother-in-law's desire for companionship, he is induced to rusticate in the mountains in the belief that he needs must take the rest cure.

To a jovial, fun-loving nature as typified by his brother-in-law, unusual inconveniences are trivial items, but to old John they mean discomfort.

Riding seven miles over rough country roads in a nearly springless wagon, and perched among movable trunks and sundry baggage, might be passed over as an incident; but to be deposited without ceremony or the knowledge of the other occupants of the vehicle in the middle of the road and act as a buffer for the contents of the wagon would prejudice almost anyone against the simple life. How one can rest amidst a horde of mischievous youngsters who consider that your sole reason for being in the vicinity is to act as a subject for their pranks, John does not appreciate. To have an afternoon nap disturbed by suddenly being drenched by a pail of ice-cold spring water and then buried 'neath tons of hay, to have an interesting day's fishing spoiled by an involuntary bath, might afford occasion for anger in almost anyone.

But the worm will turn, and so did John when this old bachelor and woman hater was pestered by an old female, who will not give up hopes of capturing a man till Gabriel toots his horn, and so, when his one enjoyment—a bath in the old swimming hole—was interfered with by this female, his clothes removed and the entire population aroused and brought upon the scene to recover his drowned body, John then and there rebelled and vowed that the rest cure would entice him never again.

YANKEE

THE BROKER'S DAUGHTER.—With an independent income, a beautiful home and a talented daughter, Joseph Jacobs could not leave well enough alone.

As a clothing manufacturer he had shown ability, was successful and prospered. But, filled with ambition, he longed for new worlds to conquer, and, like many another unshorn lamb, chose Wall street as his field of action.

Jacobs' experience is but a repetition of so many similar tales chronicled in the daily paper. The cobbler should stick to his last—the same old story—ruin and bankruptcy. But how of them at home? The tales of business failure do not divulge the sufferings and heartaches of the wives and children. In this case Jacobs' daughter Ethel received the full brunt of the storm.

Ethel a few short months previously had met Ralph Rose—the acquaintance was formed at the time he soundly thrashed several roughs who had offered insult to Ethel—and it was a case of love at first sight.

The father received Ralph with much favor and it was during the festivities of the engagement party given in honor of Ethel and Ralph that the crisis occurred.

Called from among his guests, Jacobs is handed a telegram requesting his immediate presence at the office, where he finds chaos reigning. The bottom has dropped out of the market. Every available resource possessed by him is thrown into the breach. Not a dozen fortunes equal to Jacobs' can stem the tide.

Wiped out and ruined, he returns to his home, where he informs the assemblage that he is bankrupt. Like rats leaving a sinking vessel, his guests lose no time in making their departure; all but Ralph, who offers his entire resources, which Jacobs and his daughter in their pride refuse. Ethel is made of stern stuff, reassures her father, and, who can tell, perhaps saves him from a suicide's grave.

You might as well be dead as broke. The once successful business man after years of struggle peddles suspenders, collar buttons and such for a livelihood, while his daughter labors as a shirtwaist hand.

But every cloud has a silver lining, for one fine day Jacobs finds before a prominent New York department store a lady's bag containing a large sum of money and other valuables. Shouting fails to stop the departing auto; therefore, Jacobs takes his find home, where the struggle between keeping this fortune and its return is long and bitter. Ethel saves the day; there is nothing to indicate the owner, so Ethel advertises the property as found.

An article so valuable must belong to someone, and so it does; the owner scans the morning paper and departs to the address mentioned, with the full intention of handsomely rewarding the finder, and so he does, for the purse belonged to Ralph's mother, and Jacobs obtains as a reward a son-in-law and freedom from further poverty.

THE U. S. REVENUE DETECTIVE.—Wm. McPherson bids his wife and baby good-bye for a journey into the wilds of Kentucky. He has been summoned by the Revenue Department for this important mission.

The moonshiners have grown unusually energetic and Uncle Sam determined that every still should be smashed, and when Uncle Samuel says a thing he generally means it.

Mac's wife and baby were very dear to him and these continual separations caused a tugging at his heartstrings, greater than the serious events of his adventurous calling. But a man in his position is not supposed to question. The word "duty" is paramount on every occasion.

Arriving at a small town in Kentucky armed with a letter from his chief, he was successful in obtaining the services of a number of picked men who knew every inch of the ground and were practically without fear. As a construction crew on a new branch of railroad their identity was very successfully concealed.

After a season of careful strategy and numerous hand battles the gang was put to rout, handcuffed and "moonshine" became a dead letter in that section. One of the most difficult problems of his career now confronted Mac.

A young moonshiner with a pretty wife and daughter presented the problem. During one of his scouting expeditions Mac and Simpson, his right-hand man, were captured by two guards, dragged into the moonshine camp and stared death in the face for a few moments as they looked down the muzzles of their guns. Mac was a jovial chap and probably his coolness and bravery at this crucial moment caused the young wife to intervene in his behalf; and the sight of the other deputies coming to the rescue led to their attempt to escape at that moment. The battle was short and decisive; the vagabonds were outnumbered and outclassed, Mac being well satisfied with the result.

One incident remained—the detective came upon the young moonshiner hiding in the well, his wife and baby by his side. There was no question, the man merited arrest and a long term of imprisonment, but the wife pleaded: "I saved your life, now spare us." Thoughts of home and his own baby—well, Mac shut his official eyes for a moment. The department never heard of it, but Mac felt he did his duty nevertheless.

"IMP."

ONCE UPON A TIME.—She is a rustic maid, five feet three, of romance and sentiment. She is wooed by a very unromantic farm variety Romeo. Her time is whiled away with reading tales of plumed knights and doughty encounters in the lists, all of which hold no hidden charm or glamor for her suitor. One day an itinerant hypnotist passes through the town, and encounters the imaginative damsel, and is tempted to experiment with her as a subject. He gets her under his mesmeric power, and transplants her to the olden days of chivalry and knight-errantry, when there was no betwixt and between, when one was either bold and valiant, or a blue-livered craven. Suddenly, she looks about her, and notices that her father and sweetheart have been transformed into seventeenth century squires, with armor and helmet and the rest of the gaudy paraphernalia. She is convinced that the characters have walked out of the pages of her book, and sees in her sweetheart her own particular Prince Charming. At the happy and unexpected realization she falls—right into his inviting arms, and no knight of the olden day could press a damsel fair and sweet to his heart as does our hero the elusive bit of femininity that now is all his own.
IMP

THE HOODOO ALARM CLOCK.—Did you ever have a telegram thrust into your hands, making it imperative for you to leave town suddenly on some urgent business, and rush home to make hasty preparations for catching the next train to your proposed destination, and meet with all sorts and varieties of difficulties in finding the things you require for the trip, and then, when your valise is quite completely filled, misplace it, and search in the most improbable places and finally find it placed in a conspicuous position on the table, and eventually are ready to leave, and kiss your wife good-bye, when she suddenly discovers that you have forgotten to shave, and rush back to wield the razor, and that finished, prepare a second time to leave the house, when you suddenly feel for your hat and discover that it is elsewhere than on your head, and start a wild search for your capillary covering, and after a strenuous exploration finally find it and finally leave the house and get as far as the corner when something you have forgotten occurs to you, and you make a scramble back to the house, and stand on the bathtub to look for the desired article, and suddenly miss your footing and slip into the water, this, of course, necessitating a change of clothing and an incidental delay of many minutes, and then realize that you still have time to make the train if you hustle things up, only to get at the station just as your train is pulling out? Well, that is just the experience Cyrus Smith undergoes, except that in the heartrending moment of mournful deliberation after he realizes that he has missed his train, he discovers that he has tied the alarm clock about his neck instead of fastening his watch to the chain. Gloomily, he retraces his steps from the railroad station, and falls in with a few boon companions, to whom he relates his misadventure, and who suggest to him that he drown his sorrow in the nectar of the Democrats. But judging from the quantity of the beverage he imbibes, his sorrow has learned to swim, and when at last he takes the few shortest ways home, he is a sadder Budweiser man. Arrived there, he closets himself up in his room. His wife, who has very good ear-sight, hears the sound of some one moving, and afraid to open the door, sends for neighbors, and a few of the arms of the law, who open the door and discovers the miscreant. Of course, his wife intervenes and prevents his arrest—and probably waits until the cold gray dawn of the morning after for the traditional curtain treatise.

One day Jack brings a letter to [illegible] which reads that [illegible] sister, and spend [illegible] vacation with him and will leave west as soon as [illegible] Little do Jack and his life's [illegible] would take a different [illegible] Well, she arrives. She [illegible] his heart [illegible] in order and they, or at least Jack, thinks she is worth living. Then comes a spranned ankle [illegible] Jack and [illegible] Bessie [illegible] care of [illegible] [illegible] more and Jack realizes his love and [illegible] [illegible] Jack's [illegible] to gamble, so he leaves the camp and wanders aimlessly away. Meantime, a ranchman, before he could defend himself, is robbed by a desperado, who rides off on the stolen horse. Cowboys, happening along, revive the ranchman, mount him on a horse and all ride away. The desperado, seeing his pursuers in the distance, jumps from the horse and makes his way on foot, and Providence wills it that his course be that which Jack took, who, when the former comes upon him, forces him to go back the way he came. Meanwhile the ranchman and cowboys alighted from their horses at Joe's camp, where they chanced to see the stolen mount. They insist, even though their search revealed nothing, that Joe is guilty and he is about to be led away, when Jack comes in with the guilty man. Apologies are offered and accepted, and what else could Joe do, to prove his gratitude, but give Bessie to Jack, exacting a promise, however, that gambling be a forgotten thing.

A COWBOY'S GENEROSITY.—A poor old couple owe to a crafty, unprincipled old Mexican payment on a mortgage. He comes to collect the amount, they tearfully acknowledge their inability to pay and they are told to vacate. Their daughter, Inez, a pretty, happy natured damsel, comes in and realizes the awful situation. She appeals to the old man and he makes a bargain with the aged couple—the daughter as payment. This they refuse, but Inez decides to the contrary, and, taking the paper, tears it, giving the pieces to her father and bids them a sorrowful adieu. The old man is well satisfied with the deal, and after a patronizing farewell, helps his youthful companion into his carriage. She weeps all the way to his residence and when ushered into the reception room her grief is boundless. He attempts to pacify and caress her, but she flees from the house, he following after. She appeals to an American cowboy for protection, but the odds are against him, he is overpowered by three Mexicans, who obey the wrathy old man. The poor cowboy is led to a shack, bound hand and foot and left guarded by the three Mexicans. Inez is locked in a room, there to remain until submissive. The wide awake American is not passive, he seizes the opportunity to silence his guard and then loosens his hands and feet. This done he downs the other two Mexicans and makes his way to the house. After a search he finds Inez and together they escape. When the old man goes again to her home for her, he is met by the suave American, who gives him the money on his mortgage and hastens his departure. The finale is predestined. The American cowboy and Inez find solace in each other's charms and the old couple in their child's happiness.

DRAMAGRAPH

BEYOND ENDURANCE.—Is a story taken from life and running the gamut of every emotion. It shows Ned Singleton, a country boy just grown to manhood, as he is about to leave his country home to seek his future life in the Metropolis, the breaking of home ties is faithfully shown; his arrival from the ferry; his first gaze at the tall skyscrapers; the lure that has called many a lad from a happy home, filled with ambition to do battle with the great big world and grasp for its riches. Through a combination of circumstances Ned does not find his path so smooth and rosy as he did amid the peace and quiet of his little native village. Things are going pretty hard for him, rough going and hard lines. Yet he is too proud to let the old folks know at home of his luck, also fearing to have the neighbors say, "Well, I told ye so." Besides, the pretty village belle at home that was waiting for him must never know. So Ned struggled along striving to get employment, until at last, worn with the ravages of hunger, he falls fainting in front of a cafe. A young man of the east side type coming from the cafe finds Ned. He assists him into the cafe and feeds him, besides giving him money. Ned tells his story to the young, who laughs at Ned, saying, "Pal, no one ought ever to go hungry in this big burg; come with me and I'll show you how to make more money than you ever saw." Ned, not suspecting that the plain-looking chap who was telling him this was none other than the famous Young Badger known as one of the leaders of a band of counterfeiters, Ned is taken to the headquarters of the gang, and there shown large stacks of counterfeit bills. As Ned realizes the truth, all his manly instinct rebels, and with horror he refuses to listen to the Badger. The leader has just forced a $20 counterfeit bill into Ned's hands for examination, when at the same moment the door breaks in and police officers with drawn guns confront them. Ned, not realizing for the moment what he is doing, thrusts the bill into his pocket, which it is shortly after discovered by the officers. Ned pleads his innocence, of course, but they only laugh at his story. Caught with the goods is too strong a case of circumstantial evidence for his poor wits to beat. We find him a trusty in Sing Sing prison along with the Badger and many of his ilk. It's a very warm day. Ned is scrubbing the corridor of the prison leading from the office to the cells. The Governor of the State is making a call that day. He is seen with the warden inspecting the prison. The Governor wears a long light overcoat. It being too warm he removes it. The warden hands it to Ned to carry to the office. How well he does it is shown in the picture. Two years later the Badger has served his full term, and is seen leaving with the good wishes of the warden, who not only gives him good advice, but stakes him to a little real money, as the Badger has promised to reform. About the first thing the latter does is to get himself out with a check suit and enough to talk. This was one of the things the Badger now considered essential for his reformation. In the meantime Ned has prospered after his unique escape from prison. He secured a position as clerk in a real estate office and speculated a little in Jersey lots, until he was able to send for his country sweetheart and marry her, though she never knew what experience Ned went through. One day on the street at Fort Lee the Badger, going along head down and broke discovered Ned, now well dressed and prosperous. Unseen by Ned the Badger tracks him to his office. Imagine Ned's surprise when he is found out by the one who first got him into the toils. This is soft for the Badger. "Come across, Pal. You escaped. I served my bit." Now can settle with me or you go back to Sing Sing." Imagine poor innocent Ned's feeling? And it was some. The Badger had the power to send him back, to serve the balance of a term given to an innocent man. Well, there was nothing to do but pay, or go back. From that day forth Ned's life was simply a hell on earth. The Badger's demands and threats almost drove him mad. In despair he tells the Badger he is almost broke. The Badger points to the safe. "Get to the Gopher." Ned realizes now that something has to be done. He makes the Badger promise never to come near his office again under any circumstances, and to accept a certain amount of money for his silence, which is not a crime, as the Badger knows full well. The paper is signed. It runs on for some time. The Badger is again broke, so he trails Ned to his home, writes a letter to Ned asking for so much money, still holding the threat over him. As the Badger breaks in through a bay window of Ned's home and hides, Ned enters. Seeing the window open, he inspects the place, and finds the Badger. The Badger, with his old devil-may-care manner and maddening laugh, confronts Ned. All the instinct of the man possesses Ned. The Badger draws a gun, and in self defense, one of the greatest fights ever seen in a picture takes place. Ned overcomes his enemy.

JENKS' DAY OFF.—Mr. Jenks and his family are spending the Summer in a fashionable Summer hotel, where Mr. Jenks is kept bored and busy performing the many services demanded by his wife. He hits upon the bright idea of sending himself a business telegram which will necessitate his immediate presence in the city, and then starts out on a little vacation on his own account. Walking on the beach he discovers a secluded spot, and leaving his clothes on the beach he takes a swim.

In the meantime, a convict, who has escaped from a nearby penitentiary, has entered a house nearby in search of a change of clothes, his stripes being too conspicuous. The convict locks the woman of the house up and ransacks the house, but the only garments he can find are women's clothes, and deciding that they are better than stripes, he dons them. As the convict in his new disguise is walking along the beach, he sees Jenks' clothes lying there and promptly makes another change.

There is nothing for Jenks to do when he comes out except to array himself as a woman. On his way back to the hotel he passes the house that has been robbed, and is unlucky enough to hear the woman's cry for help. When she gets out of the closet, through his aid, she naturally believes that he is the convict, and screams for help. Jenks, frightened, runs away, but is captured after a chase in which the entire village takes part. His wife and daughter witness his humiliation, and it is almost impossible for him to "square things."

THE RESTORATION.—Hugh Logan is a widower who lives with his only child, a little girl, in a small cottage in the country. Logan is a commercial traveler and, as the play opens, is preparing to leave on a business trip. He takes a train to the city, where he is attacked by footpads, who leave him unconscious in the roadway.

He is found by Maud Neal and her father, who are passing in an auto, and they take him to their home. There he revives, but the shock has affected his memory, and he is unable to recall anything of his past life.

The kindly Neal secures him employment, and as time passes Logan falls deeply in love with Maud. He finally proposes to her and is accepted.

In the meantime, little May has been waiting in vain for her father. As no word is received from him, and she has no other relatives, Bridget, the servant, takes her to the orphan asylum, where she is compelled to make her home with other little unfortunates.

May dislikes the place. In the end she escapes from it. But, gaining the city, she gets lost there and, tired and hungry, goes to sleep on a doorstep the Neals'. Here she is found by Maud, who takes her into the house. Maud is much attracted by the child's charms and finally decides that she must never be parted from her.

She tells Logan of her decision and he objects. They quarrel. Feeling himself in the wrong, Logan returns and asks Maud's pardon.

He meets May, who recognizes her father. At sight of her, his memory returns. Speedily he determines to retain May from out the things of the old life, and Maud from out of the new.

THE BURIED MAN OF TEBESSA.—Aroun, a sheikh, is in love with the daughter of a rival sheikh. The affection of the former is reciprocated, but rivalry prevents open meetings, so messages are sent to arrange a rendezvous. One from the lover falls into the father's hands, the messenger being bastinadoed until he discloses the identity of the sender. The savage sheikh goes into a cavern in the desert; then calling his forces together, raids the camp of Aroun, and is successful in capturing the man who has dared to meet his daughter in secret, causes a hole to be dug in the sand and buries Aroun up to his neck. The messenger, meanwhile, notwithstanding his injuries, tracks the girl, rescues her, and finally the pair reach poor Aroun and dig him out. But his treatment has been too severe, and he dies in his sweetheart's arms, to be followed almost immediately by the girl into the land of shadows.

COMPETITION OF THE POLICE AND GUARD DOGS.—This film gives us a most wonderful reproduction of this strange, exciting contest, and furnishes us a fine appreciation of the sensational and really amazing feats performed by the contestants, and exhibits the cleverness of the celebrated dog "Jules," who has held the championship of the world for three years.

NESTOR FILMS.

SONS OF THE WEST.—No parent, John Adwell testily declared to his good wife, was so pestered with his children as was he. Nina, for whom he had picked out a suitable husband, stubbornly insisted she would have no one but Dick Bertram, while Peck threw his money away as if it were water—but it would have to stop, once and for all.

For her part, Nina had come to the same conclusion; her stolen meetings with Dick should stop—ere nightfall she would be his bride, and then, with her mother's aid, she would coax Dad into bestowing his blessing.

As for Peck—maddened by the sarcastic smiles of the boys at Jim's gambling house, when he failed to get the loan of a couple of hundred dollars, he decided to quietly "borrow" it from his father's safe and pay it back out of his winnings—and it was while in the act of "borrowing" from the safe that Dick Bertram, who had stolen in to get Nina, surprised the young man.

A wild race followed, in which the young people won, for the minister was already pronouncing them man and wife, before the cowboys dashed into sight.

However, things still looked pretty black, for Adwell refused absolutely to believe Dick's protestations of innocence; and, although the young man at once sent Jack Adler after Peck to explain the missing money, it was with difficulty that Nina persuaded the boys to give her husband a few moments' respite.

Fortunately Jack found Peck, money and all, at the gambling house, where he no sooner learned of his friend's danger than he swung into his saddle and galloped furiously to the Ranch house, arriving just as the posse's patience had become exhausted.

Mrs. Adwell's pleadings, together with Peck's solemn promise to give up gambling, and the knowledge that he had so grievously wronged Dick, softened the Old Man so that he not only forgave but asked forgiveness of his children.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

A MAN'S WAY.—Darby, a country boy, is in love with Mary, a neighbor's daughter. Ethel Harrington is spending the Summer with her father, a wealthy New York merchant, in the vicinity, and is trying to get some flowers she falls and sprains her ankle. Darby comes along, picks her up and carries her to her automobile, where her father thanks him and gives him his card. Darby is smitten with the city girl and later he makes up his mind to go to the city and win a fortune. He secures employment in the office of Ethel Harrington's father.

Four years pass. Darby is now general manager of Mr. Harrington's business. The rich man's daughter consents to marry him. Meanwhile we see poor little Mary feeding her chickens and refusing the attentions of a young farmer because she believes that Darby will some day come back to her.

Darby's marriage to Ethel has been announced, but one evening at a dinner party he sees Nora, son Mary, a wealthy swell, flirting with his fiancee. Later as feels the young couple kissing and embracing. A quarrel with Ethel follows and two hours later Darby receives a note from her telling him that she has eloped with Miles.

Some time passes and Darby finds an old keepsake that the country girl had given him. He determines to see her again and he goes back to the old farm. Here a surprise awaits him, for when Mary comes to meet him to greet him as carries on her arm her baby boy, and in answer to Darby's question she introduces him to her husband, a young farmer.

HIS BABY'S SHIRT. John Barrett is a steam driller working on the P. R. R cut. This is a great scene, showing the steam scrapers and drillers at work. Barrett knocks down a brutal foreman who has attacked his chum, and Barrett is discharged.

A month later we find him dead broke and dejected, having lost wife and year old baby to make one more try for another job. He enters a gin mill and there meets "Kid" Rowe, a bad character, who tries to persuade Barrett to help him to hold up the saloon keeper and rob him. Barrett refuses and goes home. His wife is just mending the baby's little flannel shirt. She places it on the couch. Barrett places his coat upon it.

"Kid" Rowe comes in and persuades Barrett to go to the saloon and help him get the money. We see the two men stand outside the saloon. Then "Kid" enters to see how the land lies. Barrett starts to put on his coat. He has made up his mind to steal in order to get food for his family. The baby's shirt falls to the ground.

"Kid" Rowe comes out and tries to persuade Barrett to go in the saloon. Barrett looks at the shirt and says, "No! I won't do it" and walks away.

INDIAN SQUAW'S SACRIFICE.—Tom Shelby is employed as manager in the office of Ned Thornby's father. Both Tom and Ned have the combination to the safe. Ned's life is the usual one of a successful broker's son—cafes, women, wine, gambling are his amusements. Tom, on the contrary, is high-minded and self-respecting and deeply in love with Ned's sister. Ned is seen in a fashionable gambling establishment, surrounded by both men and women gamblers. He loses his stakes; the gambling mania has so strong an attraction for him he determines to secure money from his father's safe. Quickly stealing away, he accomplishes the robbery and returns only to again be fleeced. Tom, arriving at the office next morning, finds the safe door open; while wondering what had occurred Ned enters. He explains to Ned, who immediately accuses Tom of the crime and attempts to call the police to arrest Tom, who at that moment discovers Ned's cane lying on the floor. The tables are turned. Ned begs Tom to shield him from disgrace. This Tom agrees to do through his love for Ned's sister. Mr. Thornby enters, robbery is explained to him, Tom accepts the blame, is ordered from the office and seeks his sweetheart to bid her good-bye. We next find Tom in the mountains, where he has made a "rich strike." He shows his bag of gold dust to a crowd of friendly miners in a saloon. The sight of so much gold excites the lust of a Mexican and white desperado, who decide to rob him. They follow Tom, who has left the place and who in going through the dense woods meets Nowceta, the pretty Indian maiden. He bids her good-bye and proceeds on his way. Nowceta hears footsteps approaching and hides behind a clump of bushes and overhears the two desperadoes plotting to rob Tom. She endeavors to prevent this, but arrives too late, as she finds Tom has already been assaulted and robbed. With much labor and tenderness she assists him to her tepee, and there nurses him back to strength. We next find, a few years later, Tom and Nowceta married and parents of a handsome little child of about five years of age. Tom seems happy and contented as a squaw man but returning from his work he, in reading a newspaper, discovers that Ned has made a death bed confession exonerating him from any share in the crime. Mr. Thornby and his daughter have been seeking Tom and at last find him in his cabin home with Nowceta and their son. His old love is seen in his face by Nowceta who, heartbroken asks Tom the meaning of his embraces and affectionate looks to the beautiful white girl. Upon being told the truth of the situation she kisses her husband and child a last good-bye, quickly snatches Tom's revolver and running to the woods, there destroys herself in order that her deep love for her husband shall not stand in his way to marry his first love.

"A Miner's Sweetheart"

A novel subject with an exceptionally strong plot, which has been exceedingly well worked out. Bessie comes into the life of a rough miner, and although their love is mutual, they are temporarily separated by her brother. Jack performs a kindly service, in gratitude for which Bessie is given to him. The photography of this film is up to the usual "Bison" standard and cannot be excelled.

"A Cowboy's Generosity"

A western drama quite out of the ordinary, the scenes of which are laid in romantic California. A crafty Mexican land owner would accept in payment for a mortgage, Inez, the daughter of his tenants; but after acceding to his proposition she flees in terror from his home and is aided in her escape by an American cowboy, who later pays the money to the Mexican and Inez becomes his sweetheart. This subject is an exceptionally thrilling one with photography of the highest order.
